Americans have learned at their own expense that they, no more than any other people, are free from the dangers of overproduction and that their home market, incomparable as it is, is also susceptible of saturation. They lived in an optimism of such a nature that they placed themselves above humanity. They have been rudely brought back by the ferrule of the contingent and the relative. Doubtless the adaptation will be painful. The mad course of industries must be checked and regulated more strictly than in the past by the capacity for consumption of the home market, and in the effort which will be made to enlarge foreign markets they will be forced to take into consideration the problem of foreign credits, the world as a whole being in debt to the United States to the amount of $16,000,000,000, which by a kind of mechanical necessity tends to impose upon them a passive commercial balance; that is, a surplus of imports.

Moreover, American society as a whole finds its true equilibrium in a rapid and uninterrupted expansion. What will happen to the political and social peace if this expansion loses its rapidity and its continuity? On top of this, for the 6,000,000 farmers and their families (20 per cent of the population), whose whole economic life was based on the very high prices at which their farm products were quoted during the war, this liquidation, this indispensable process of elimination, will be singularly cruel.

All these processes of putting things back in order will be all the more strongly felt since Mr. Hoover, under the pressure of the politicians, has unfortunately worked in the opposite direction and by a number of steps of doubtful orthodoxy (loans from the Farm Board, &c.) keeps "the deadwood from falling." But the necessary amputation will come sooner or later, and the Americans will have gained by this experience that sense of proportion which they have hitherto too often lacked, notably in the last five or six years. A malady of youth, this lack of a sense of proportion—a malady of youth which manifests itself in the exuberance of a new and untried organism, a malady of youth which almost always proceeds the perfect self-possession of ripe age.

SIMILAR reflections enforce themselves upon any one who studies the American reaction to the prohibition laws. On the one hand, the presumption of laws which attempt to penetrate to the inwardness of individual consciences, to impose certain moral proscriptions, to govern private life. That is the first fact. Never have theocracies or monarchs by divine right shown themselves more tyrannical. Laws and men under prohibition set out to curb instincts, customs and habits when in the past violent régimes usually attacked, at most, certain beliefs, certain opinions, or even public manifestations of these beliefs or these opinions.

Here now is the second fact. The most immediate and the most evident result of this exceptional legislation has been to turn into the money boxes of criminals a stream of money comparable in amount to the income of the former Russian Empire from its alcohol monopoly. And against the avalanche of crime and assaults which this sort of thing implies, the laws and the officials work desperately. It is useless to dwell on the spectacle offered by Chicago and other large cities in this respect. There we have presumption of legislation and, beside that, powerlessness of the legislator to make himself obeyed even in the most common and ordinary domain. The one thing offsets the other.

It is the asymmetry of too rapid growth. The gestures and movements of the young giant are not yet exactly coordinated. One disproportion is corrected by another. But this revolt of public opinion, as bizarre as are its manifestations, is, after all, a symptom of health. One would pity the country which, without complaint, would swallow legislation as fantastic as that of 1919. "Resistance to oppression is the first of rights and the most sacred of duties," declares one of the revolutionary Constitutions of France. It is the instinctive maxim of a vigorous society. The risk, to be sure, is not without peril.

The Anglo-Saxon framework, the Protestant framework, which built the United States and maintains it, which imposes cohesion upon so many unlike elements, is too closely associated with prohibition not to suffer with its defeat. But no other framework to take its place is at hand and in the United States mistakes committed do not bring their punishment so severely as elsewhere. Despite the surface indifference, a collective discipline exists which in other countries has scarcely a parallel. Let the United States find a great leader—they have not had one since Woodrow Wilson and Roosevelt, and their success was only intermittent and partial—and their discipline will astonish the world.

WHEN his foot touches American soil, a Frenchman first of all must ask himself: Is it possible to count upon the United States in founding a system of international peace, for organizing and defending peace? For twelve years I have constantly replied to this question in the negative. The talks I have had, extending over a month, with many Americans of various conditions, confirm me in the opinion which I have held to so long. No, we must not count upon the United States to maintain peace. I do not mean that at the moment of danger it will furnish no assistance, but this assistance remains a gamble. In what concerns the Americans, an accident, a stone thrown by a child, may turn events one way or the other. This is something that one ought not to weary of repeating.

Taken in the mass, the American people have the taste for isolation and pride in it. Whence comes this taste and this pride? From the feeling that in the diplomatic mêlée they would show themselves inferior, a kind of inferiority complex which renders them in such cases timid and incapable of action? Or, indeed, from the proud consciousness that America has an exceptional destiny—a destiny incommensurable with the destiny of other countries? Whatever it is, the fact exists. The United States would have been able to take political and economic leadership of the universe in the years which followed the war. It contented itself with pretensions to omnipotence without responsibility. Omnipotence without responsibility—that is something which cannot last long, which is already being sensibly worn away.

THE statesmen of Washington do their best to counteract this instinctive and unreasoning abstension on the part of the multitude. In the secrecy of the chancellories they dispense good assurances. They try to build up under cover a more or less positive foreign policy. When they are called upon to produce their work in the light of day they are obliged to abandon it and disavow it. The Kellogg pact marked one of these attempts. There is no doubt that in the minds of Messrs. Coolidge and Kellogg it was to be one step toward the correction of the so-called liberty of the seas doctrine—the right of trading freely on the seas with all belligerents, even with a belligerent who is an aggressor. Yet at London, notwithstanding his obvious good-will and endless tergiversations, Mr. Stimson did not regard it as possible publicly to make the least attenuation of the accepted doctrine even for the sake of saving the five-power treaty.

I have heard the story recently of what took place at The Hague on the subject of the codification of international law, an enterprise in which our American friends have always interested themselves, which arose, indeed, from one of their favorite recommendations of what is needed for world appeasement. There were first long pourparlers in which, despite the resistance and the opposition of many, a very large place was made for the American theses. It was believed that the success of the affair was assured. What then? In the decisive votes the American delegates began by absenting themselves, then they voted against it. Filled with the sentiment of her own liberty, not knowing what she will be or what she will be worth tomorrow, America has a horror of written engagements of any sort whatever. The dyarchy which exists at Washington in all that concerns the conduct of diplomatic affairs—the division of authority and responsibility between the President and the Senate—infallibly gives practical effect to this latent desire of the people.

It must be admitted that the mode of international organization in vogue at the present time, the League of Nations, is not favorable to the evolution of the American people. Either the covenant ought to be interpreted in the spirit rather than the letter, imposing upon all the members great obligations—obligations that only nations transformed into congregations of armed monks could perform—or it should be interpreted according to the strict letter and it would be then only too easy to denounce its futility and insincerity. And that is not attractive.

But, supposing that we had the chance, should we constrain the United States and engage them, cost what it might, in the system? I do not think so. They would subordinate their adhesion to the carrying out of dangerous conditions, for example, the revision of the peace treaty, in the rather puerile idea that it is possible by amendments of a territorial and political order to create a point of perfect equilibrium where passions and self-interest will no more be translated into violence, where the satisfaction and immobility of the political universe may be comparable to those of God, the Creator, who on the seventh day contemplated his handiwork and fell asleep over its perfection. In America I have found this conception deep-rooted among men who ought to have been more enlightened. Revision of the treaties in present circumstances, alas, that probably means war!

DOES this mean that we should be complacent in the face of what exists? Not at all. In the United States they sometimes justify their abstention and determined indifference by saying, "Our attitude works for peace. Not being able to guess what will be our course, no one will ever dare to disturb the peace." What a mistake! Sir Edward Grey in July, 1914, was forced by the division of the British Cabinet to fall back on a hope of this kind. For ten years and more now, considering the mistake made, he has tried to explain on every occasion that he had not the liberty to act otherwise. One ought not to forget that the willingness to take risks is one of the phases of the war psychosis. Moreover, it is evident that, as in 1914-1916, the eventual abstention of America would come about in large part through indifference and hesitation.

At most we can reasonably expect from our American friends but two innovations. First, the correction of the doctrine of the freedom of the seas. To presume to deal freely even with an aggressor (with an aggressor in Washington's own judgment) no longer fulfills the moral requirement of the epoch. One may carry on this trade while pretending that one is not doing it, but one cannot say so any longer. To recant on the doctrine of the freedom of the seas is in no way the same thing as taking an engagement for a positive assistance and cooperation.

Secondly, more frankness, more sincerity or, if you will, more honest realism. I mean by that, that American negotiators in the future, when it is a question of their gaining some substantial advantage, should refrain from instilling in the minds of their colleagues of other countries hopes, which the American delegates are well aware are not realizable, or with difficulty realizable, on the subject of what America will do in the future. At London in the last days of the naval conference Mr. Stimson gave a striking example of this honesty. Let him be thanked and praised! Moreover, let him be imitated. For the rest, let us leave the work to time. America is young and time has not yet passed. The song of Fascist Italy should be her national hymn—"Youth! Youth!"

WHEN EDISON AND FORD WERE SEVENTEEN

At 17 Edison had acquired none of the store of information that is so largely a part of education today. That is, he had little of the orthodox information found in the schoolbooks. His own reading was universal and no doubt badly assorted. He must have had an astonishing smattering of science, philosophy, history and what not. By his own wits he had experimented largely. He was possessed of a restless, inquiring mind, never satisfied with any result and ready to attempt any risk. Altogether as complex a youngster as might have been found anywhere; disapproved by his elders; looked at askance in his home. That was Edison, at 17, without opportunities, due preparation or friends, but with confidence in himself and a hungry eagerness for whatever the future might bring.

SIXTEEN years after the inventor entered the world Henry Ford was born on a farm in what is now Dearborn, Mich.—July 30, 1863. There were 300 acres of his father's land around the house, built by the elder Ford soon after his wedding day. Young Henry's first vision of life embraced his father and mother and a hired man or two hard at work. Almost from the day that he was able to walk there was work for him as well.

There was one place on the farm where he delighted to go—the blacksmith shop in the corner of the barn where a hired man or his father mended implements on rainy days.

At 6 he was in the classroom, walking the two miles every day to District School 1. Unlike Edison, he was not suspected of being "a smart boy." Neither did he prove a particularly dull one, but went heroically to classes and returned home to do the chores. A schoolmate has made known that young Henry was poor in spelling and worse in geography, but apt at figures. He took only a mild interest in McGuffey's Reader, but Thompson's Arithmetic was a favorite book. However, the teacher observed that he seemed to use his geography more often than the study required, and came down in wrath to find Henry tinkering with a watch. What better protection than an old-fashioned geography, standing open upon his desk?

Watches were an obsession with young Henry Ford. Some of his earliest memories revolve around his wish to own one. But he was 12 before the elder Ford gratified that desire. From that day onward the watch generally was out of order, its numerous parts filling Henry's pockets.

That same year saw another change in his ambitions. Once a week his father went into town. On this day Henry went with him. In the road they met a kind of vehicle that he had never seen before—in fact, the first moving object not attached to a horse. This was a steam road engine, then coming into use. It consisted of a portable engine and boiler mounted on wheels, a water tank and coal cart trailing behind.

Henry was off his father's wagon in a moment, talking to the engineer. He saw, to his astonishment, that a chain had been rigged from the engine to the back wheels of the wagon body that bore it. When the engine was not in use for road work it propelled the outfit to the next place. And there, upon the road, the germ of an idea developed in the mind of the farmer boy that one day would change the transportation of the world.

The next year was a notable one, too, because at 13 Henry Ford first put together the parts of a watch that would run. At 15 he was considered the county's best watchmaker. Whether to take up this trade or build modified road engines for farm work was the problem of his days and nights. His mother died, darkening the Ford home and leaving the father with five youngsters to bring up. Life for Henry Ford was hard work. Everywhere he saw his father and neighbors hard at work—always at labor. And the thought grew in his mind that farm work was much harder than it should be. He looked around for ways to ease the tasks. This searching led to plans for a kind of road engine that would plow.

He built an engine out of various parts in the corner of the barn. But it was a great deal too heavy and he feared to make it lighter. He held to the idea, while continuing to attend school, picking up a scrap of history and sundry other subjects. Yet he was bored with schoolbooks. He wanted to make things.

His father, of course, would not hear about his leaving school. But a few days later it was reported that he had not attended classes, and he had failed to come home. Many fathers would have beat the county for the missing boy. The elder Ford probably smiled to himself. Henry was not a boy to get lost or go astray. In fact, he had gone to Detroit and found a job that first day as machinist's apprentice, for $2.50 a week.

A suitable boarding house room cost him $3 weekly. Yet he plunged. And a few days later his father found him, explaining that it really would be better to complete his schooling and help out on the farm. Later on, if he wished, he might return to Detroit and his job. But Henry, in the fullness of his 17 years, determined to stay. His father went home alone.

NOW the problem became how to span the gap between $2.50 and $3. He thought of watches again and started patiently to find a watchmaker who wanted a repair man by night. In the end he found a job, at $2 a week, and the economic question was solved. From that point as the years unfolded he graduated from apprentice to mechanic, then to an expert man and tinkerer on his own behalf, opening the way to the era of motor transportation.

It would be possible to draw so many conclusions from the lives of Edison and Ford that they are best left to the reader. But there are a few plain, elemental facts worthy of note. Both men had self-reliance. Both had courage. And both had original ideas they were able to translate into practical enterprises.

POINCARÉ RENEWS A CAREER AT SEVENTY

War President, Savior of the Franc and French Ideal of Prudence, He Is Again in Line for High Office

Raymond Poincare, former President and Premier of France, will be 70 years old next Wednesday, having been born at Bar-le-Duc on Aug. 20, 1860. His unique place among the political figures of his country is described in the article below, written by the Paris correspondent of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

By P. J. PHILIP

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS.

EVEN in this country of green old men, Raymond Poincaré at threescore and ten is exceptional. Only last year he had to undergo a major operation of a dangerous nature; today, near his seventieth birthday, he has entirely recovered and is as active, both physically and with his pen, as ever before.

That his past has been so well filled does not mean he is not still a man with a future. Next year, though he protests he will not accept it, he may be made President of the republic again. At all times he is regarded as a man on whom any President may at any time have to fall back to take the Premiership when, as may easily arise again, there is no one else equal to the task.

What the secret is of this man's authority in his country it is difficult to discover. Both his character and his accomplishments will discourage those who would seek to find in him any of those heroic qualities which are popularly associated with great statecraft. He is almost as devoid of the melodramatic element as Calvin Coolidge. Yet with Coolidge he shares this other similarity: that when he is head of his country things seem to go better, there are fewer difficulties, fewer complications, than under other men. Such happy fortune may be dismissed as merely luck. But there come times when, as one watches the efforts of other leaders, both here and in America, at their herculean task, one may regret these men of modest gesture who did not seem to do much, but under whose guidance things somehow got done.

France has had several of these little giants. Thiers was one; Combes was another. Robespierre, if one may dare to put him in such respectable company, was a third. Than any of these three Poincaré is a greater mystery.

The story is told of him that when a schoolboy in Lorraine he never left for school without his umbrella. One day his brother Henri protested, "But Raymond, it isn't going to rain today." Solemnly little Raymond regarded the sky. "Certainly, it doesn't look it," he said, "but, then, it might."

IT is somewhat in that spirit of extreme precaution that Raymond Poincaré has gone through life, and, strange as it may seem, it is for that that the French like him. To these people, whose ambition it is to live safely, save regularly, retire early, and die respected in a class just a little above that into which they were born, Raymond Poincaré is the type of the perfect bourgeois. They feel that with him they are safe. Did he not, while Clemenceau, in their opinion, was playing ducks and drakes with the victory they had won, stand firmly opposed to any concessions to Germany? Did he not, when Germany was not paying reparations as she should, occupy the Ruhr and compel acceptance of the Dawes plan? Dawes himself is their authority that it was so. Did he not, when the Left majority in 1926 had ruined the franc, step in and save the franc from disaster?

"Ah, that Poincaré; there's a great man for you," says the little bourgeois, recently risen into the commercial from the working class.

Poincaré suits his people, and than that no man can have greater qualification for leadership.

Intellectually and in scholarship he ranks high above those who make politics their profession and rise by it to statesmanship. His interests lie further afield than have those of any other man who has been in the Presidency of this republic. He was and is an exceptionally brilliant lawyer, and might have been as brilliant a scientist. His memory is phenomenal, and his power for quick assimilation and arrangement of facts is remarkable even in this country of quick brains.

Clemenceau once in his scoffing way declared: "Poincaré knows everything and understands nothing, while Briand knows nothing and understands everything." Like many of the Tiger's boutades, it held elements of truth. At the same time it was unjust. Briand's knowledge is far wider in many ways than was Clemenceau's own, though he is no classical scholar and Poincaré's understanding strikes sometimes far deeper than Clemenceau could ever penetrate. Above all, Poincaré understands his people, because he does not oppose them as fiercely as Clemenceau did, and he knows how to steer his course more cleverly. While there are many who dislike and distrust Poincaré, there are few who hate him as Clemenceau was hated. Neither, one should add, has he been loved like Clemenceau.

Within the family circle, Poincaré's affections go very deep, but he is one of those who make a ring around their fireside and cannot extend themselves beyond it. His brain admits there must be friendships outside that circle, but his heart stays domestic; he cannot seem to cross that invisible frontier. One finds this limitation, too, on a grander scale; take, for instance, the speech made on a recent Sunday to children at Sampigny, where his country home is, in the province where he was born. With gentle eloquence, as always when he speaks of intimate things, he instructed them in the love of their country and in their service to it.

"You will love it more tenderly," he said, "as you learn more exactly how it has been formed. You will serve it so much the better when you have learned to know it as a whole, with its glories and its griefs, with its successes, its failures, its hopes, its disillusions and triumphant continuity, its labor and its energy."

THEN his mind, searching out into regions his heart will never know, compelled him to add: "Of course, the affection which you reserve for your country must not lead you to forget the existence of other peoples. You must not commit the error of turning a blind eye to or misjudging the qualities they may have, and you must hope that the intelligent conciliation of their effort with ours will contribute to increase the morality and happiness of all men everywhere. At the same time, you must not allow yourselves to believe that out of respect for the human race we should throw away our patrimony and our guarantees of security."

What coldness is in that latter part, compared with the warmth with which he spoke of love within the closed circle of the French. "Be good Sampignais, good Meusiens, good Lorrainers, good Frenchmen," he concluded, marking conspicuously his own limitations.

There are those in his own country who roundly declare this now aged man, who has been Foreign Minister, Finance Minister, Premier and President of his country, has had, just because of those limitations, an influence quite the reverse of that for which he is acclaimed, and he suffers acutely under such an accusation. "Poincaré-la-Guerre" he was dubbed nearly ten years ago, and in many weighty tomes of memoirs and many fiery speeches he has sought eagerly and passionately to disprove the accusation. His writings will be an immense embarrassment to his biographers. For how, in such a mass of evidence, is one ever to find the truth? Replying recently to one of his critics, one of those Frenchmen who have taken up the argument that Germany was not solely responsible for the war, Poincaré at once consented to answer his arguments and to publish question and answer in the same volume. Of course, nothing is proved thereby. What is astonishing is that this man who is, or should be, above politics should so insistently plunge into them.

No one ever accused him of having sought the war. The worst and only criticism was that, both as Foreign Minister and as President, he bowed to the force of events and, instead of seeking to discover a way by which the threatened result might be avoided, his mind and policy contributed to their precipitation. Caillaux had avoided war in 1909. Briand's policy now is directed in every possible way to avoid war. Both of these men possess a more flexible mind than Poincaré. Yet, when all is summed up, there is no one who must not in honesty give Poincaré the benefit of the belief that he could not avoid what no one else could, not even Sir Edward Grey.

THE occupation of the Ruhr was one of those episodes in Poincaré's political life in which he appeared in the rôle of the man of action, which in reality seldom has been his rôle. He is far more a man of words than a man of action. Events, logic, and the text of treaties, plus his own previous attitude in writings and speeches, drove him to occupying the Ruhr. Millerand was then at the Elysées, and Millerand was for it if only to avenge the snub he had received when he occupied Frankfort without the consent of the allies, and had to beat a retreat before Lord Curzon. Poincaré was in a measure only an instrument in the matter of the Ruhr occupation, yet one finds this curious circumstance: That his honesty and tremendous anxiety for a justification have made him ever since almost the only defender of, and apologist for, that incident.

All those others who shared the responsibility for it and all its consequences have gone on, forgetful to other failures or successes. Poincaré alone still seeks to justify his action and claims for it that it was right and not only right but opportune. He cannot dismiss it any more than he can dismiss those accusations that his policy was at least in part to blame for the precipitation of the war. Even if he made them, and knew he made them, one feels that Poincaré could never admit a mistake.

He will always be remembered best, and it should suffice him, as the one man in France who, in 1926, when the accumulated errors of eight years of financial living on faith had provoked a catastrophe, was able to win and to hold the confidence of his countrymen. He proved no wizard in finance. He broke many accepted rules and seemed for a time to be tackling the job by the tail instead of by the head, just to show that Caillaux had been wrong. But he proved that he was wiser than his rival. For Caillaux had, properly, wanted to proceed to stabilizing the situation in France by ratifying France's debts to the Allies first of all. After that he had his road all planned out. The Chamber of Deputies, however, refused to take the first step and he, with Briand, was forced to retire.

Poincaré until then had been one of the foremost of those who clamored for revision of the debt settlements, but wisely avoided making the matter a first issue. He began methodically with a series of simple operations, which would give the denuded treasury a chance to carry on, imposing new taxation, and seeing to it that old taxes were collected. Instead of settling old debts, he concentrated on new ones, but did it skillfully and applied Caillaux's plan in several instances, notably by creating an autonomous sinking fund.

Here once more one finds Poincaré following, accepting rather than directing, the logic of events, this time happily.

TIDES OF THE GREAT CITY

The point is that here was added to the tide created by the retirement of the more prosperous to points more and more remote from the centre of town (whether these points were along Washington Heights or out in Westchester or Long Island, in New Jersey or even in Connecticut) another tide of the less prosperous (or not yet prosperous) who for the sake of the saving in rents or purchase payments moved out as far as the nickel would carry them and still get them to work on time. As all the daughters of these families went out as usual, in spite of the subway ride, to work in factories, shops or offices, and as the daughters of most of the other families began also to go out to work in shops and offices—in short, as the feminine conquest of the lower levels of business proceeded—the tide back and forth swelled and assumed the aspect with which we are now familiar. It became the two-a-day rush-hour stream of men and women—the majority of the women still young and dressed with obvious intent to lead captive the roving eye of the male—the stream, which of a morning pours into our streets from the shuttle of subways, tubes and ferries and of an evening hurries back along the same streets set on packing itself into the same shuttle of subways, tubes and ferries.

THIS is the restless tide of Manhattan, not wholly different from the tides that the circumstances of our mechanized modern life cause to flow daily in and out of all big cities—and even little ones.

But the tides of Manhattan are caught in narrow channels and run more furiously. And the people that are the human material of the tides are mixed of so many races, nativities, complexions, languages, gestures; the press is compounded out of so many social levels and such a variety of manners, education and occupation, that there is in the round world no human tide to match it for volume, density and heterogeneity, all combined. Likewise, we have our mechanisms for sucking it up through lifts into tall buildings, so that, except at the noon lunch hour, when a hurried flow and ebb out of these tall buildings chokes the streets, all those myriads of people are lost to outer view as if they were not.

In the hours between the streets are awash with another tide. But this is a tide that has no regular ebb and flow, only cross-currents and swirling eddies. It is the tide of the shoppers and the sightseers and the idlers and the prowlers. On the footways most walk swiftly, and few saunter; many stand balked by the red lights and the rush of empty taxicabs to take advantage of the green lights. In the driveways is a massing, a furious charging and a sullen stopping of motor cars, private and public, and every little while a damming up of great fleets of buses, like herds of elephants. The human tide that is carried on these million wheels is as heterogeneous as that which goes on foot.

In the morning and the evening, part of the general flow of the tide is the swift procession of shining motor cars and other motor cars not so shining along Park Avenue and the race of flights of taxicabs through Central Park, whisking sleek business men — and women — to their desks or back home again. Here flows the froth on the top of the daily flood, whereof so much more than the dregs runs underground. Down there at each station a frightful clatter is heard as the crowd plunges through the turnstiles in the rush for the wide shut-in-your-face doors of the long lines of crowded cars that follow so close upon each other. Close as they are, there are never enough of them. There never are enough wheels turning to roll the human tides smoothly back and forth.

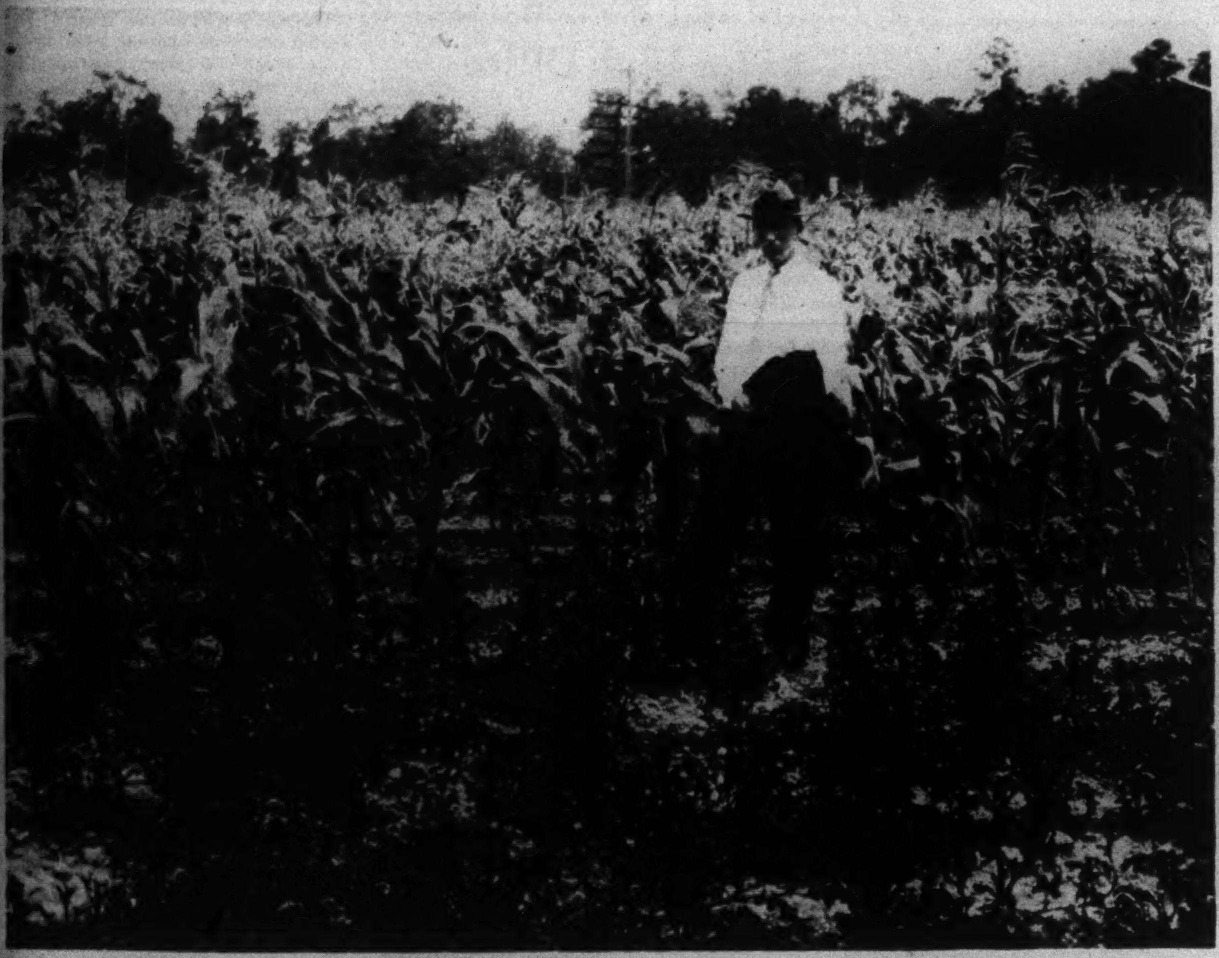
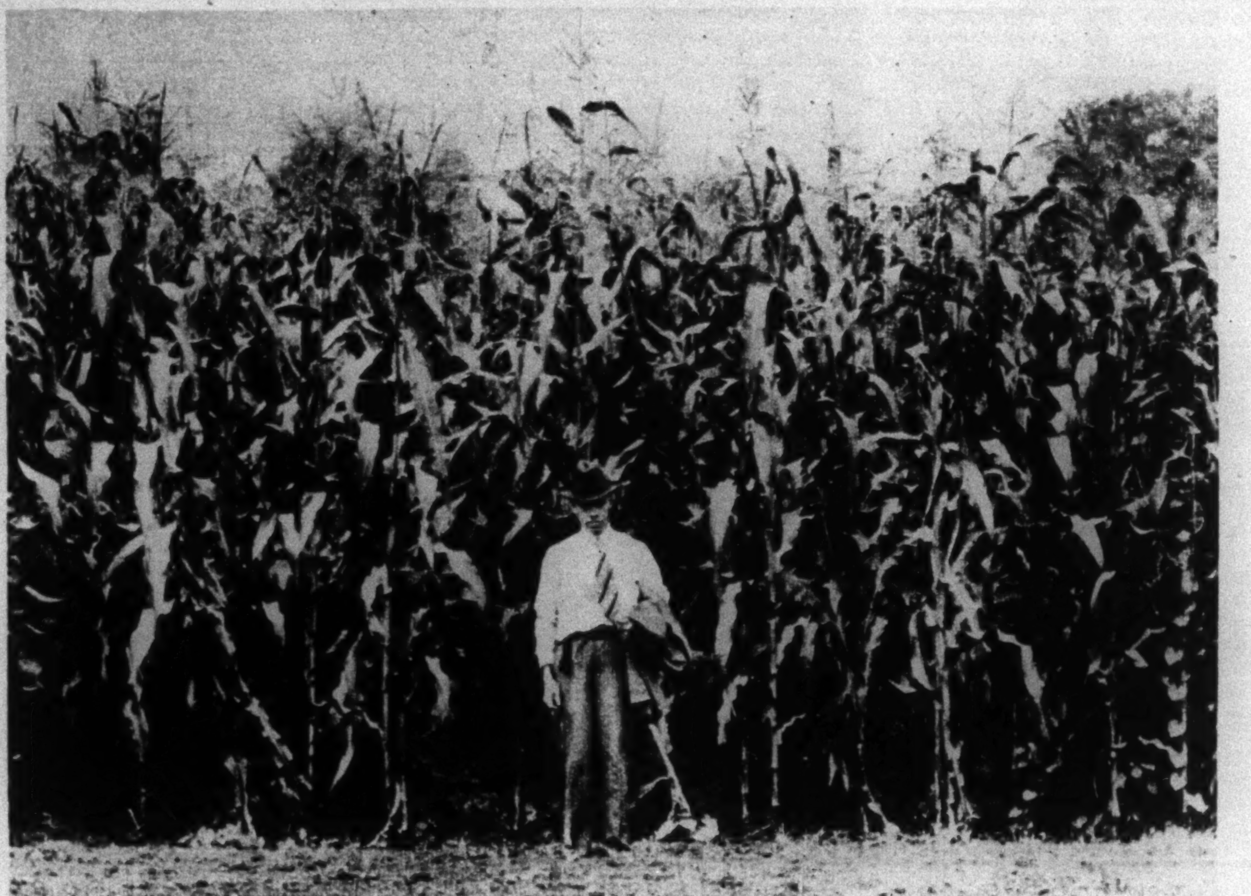
WHEN DROUGHT SEARS CROPS AND HOPES

A Picture of the Farmer as He Faces the Scourge of The Heat That Kills





A Tragic Contrast.

By LEWIS F. CARR

SPRING comes. Earth stirs. The stretch of timber along the creek takes on a covering of green over the dead gray of bare branches. The peach tree behind the house breaks into pink and purple. Meadow larks sing. Cows bring calves. Mares find colts. Little chicks hatch. Everything is born anew. This is the time of the great promise.

Everybody feels it. Cowmen realize it suddenly. "Waugh-hei!" they shout from the bunk house. "Grass grew a foot last night! Aw-hei! Go an' get it, you dobies!" They put on their best togs, saddle up, jog into town. The long stretch of Winter feeding is over. They can rest a while.

Plantation bells ring at 4 in the morning in the cotton country. The plowhands sing—you can hear them for five miles around—as the small-footed mules step out down the cotton rows. "Cotton an' corn! an, we gwine to make it dis year!"

Far north, sap is running. Snow lingers, but it is maple syrup time.

In the Corn Land, small patches of green wheat stand out like new jewels in an old setting. To the west wheat, as far as the eye can see; and black cattle and red in the pastures. To the northwest, they are plowing for Spring seeding with flowers in the brow bands. This is going to be the great year, unlike all others. Even the engineer on the cannonball freight—you can tell by his whistle that he knows it too.

In town Saturday afternoon, everybody's jabbering. Wheat going to a dollar and a half? Cattle to fifteen cents, or maybe twenty? Or perhaps it is cotton, bound for two-bits a pound. The merchant smiles. The store clerks sing snatches from old songs occasionally. Even the banker, loafing on the corner, catches the contagion.

"You say you don't need any more money, John?"

"I owe you plenty already."

"Yeah, but you better get a little more. Nothing like having enough, you know."

"Well, since you mention it ——"

Monday morning the plows are out before daylight, running just right with the brown earth rolling from the mold board. The horses bend to the work; birds follow the plow; old Ranger scares up a rabbit. "He's a great one!"

The clover has been seeded. The oats go in. The teams start plowing for corn. The season could not be better. The wheat is standing up like an army. "Oh, this is the year for us. We'll pay those debts and add the new wing to the house and put in lights and water. That'll get the womenfolks satisfied. Old Joe Higgins has made his brag that he's goin' to pay for his farm this year. Jim Smith says he's goin' to catch up with his interest.

"Yeah. Sure. Looks like a mighty fine show for a crop. But I'll bet you my hat if that corn hadn't gone in just when it did, there wouldn't have been enough moisture to sprout it. Tim Black down the road waited a week and he didn't get a stand. He's replanted, too. And all the corn he's got you could put in a bucket. Cut worms work in dry weather. Who said dry weather? Tim Black says a dry Spring means a wet Summer and plenty of corn. Well, there's time yet. It'll rain on Memorial Day. It always does. * * *

RAIN on Memorial Day? If it did, nobody saw it. It's forgot how and the sun's sure bearin' down. Tim Black says you can plant corn clean to the end o' June. You can, with the right season. Anyway, it looks like nice weather for wheat harvest.

"Wheat didn't make out so well; barely twenty bushels to the acre, and it takes that to make it. Yes, and then some. Not enough rain to give that late nitrate a chance. Well, it'll help the clover.

"Taxes are due. Sheriff says we got to pay 'em. We can't pay 'em. Wheat's goin' down every day. And the trashing crew ate us out o' house an' home. Gracie wrote home from school for more money, didn't she? And we all had to have clothes. Good thing we borrowed that extra money, but it's too little to do with. We'll pay the 8 per cent on the taxes till wheat goes back up. It'll rain by the Fourth of July, certain.

"Hay time, and not enough clover to talk about. It takes rain to make clover. And the pastures are dryin' up. First thing you know we'll be buyin' feed—the first time since we been married. Last year the whole forty head stayed fat on the north forty. But if it don't go to rainin' pretty soon—Well, those are clouds, yes. But all signs fail in dry weather. * * *

"No rain to spoil this Fourth o' July picnic? Something wrong about that. But we'll make it, though, if folks don't get to talkin' too discouraged. Tim Black says we may as well lock the gate and throw the key away, that this ain't no year for farming. He's gone to work on the road for a contractor. Tim's funny. But it does look like we're squarin' off for a long hot spell sure enough, and the corn's suffering. But let me tell you something; put the little shovels on the cultivator and run close to that corn, fairly turn it around in the ground, drive the roots down. You'll make corn yet.

"You'll have to. It's all you've got. You know, it hasn't rained since the last of April. We're six inches behind in rainfall and no prospects. The pastures are clean gone. Hay ain't worth cutting. Wheat's goin' down. Oats don't love dry weather. You'll be buyin' feed before the month's out, mind what I tell you. I ordered my first car of hay today. God knows how I'll pay for it.

"What can you do? Gracie came home last week, and she said, 'What about sweet corn, the sixty-day kind?' There's time for it, but you'd never get it out of the ground. County demonstrator says there's a soil temperature of 140 degrees, and all you have to do is walk across the field to believe him. It'd kill anything. We counted on garden truck to carry us through till we sold the wheat. And now with tomatoes at $5 a bushel, they've all got the dry rot and not worth a dime. Lima beans and green beans are clean out o' sight, and the sun's killed 'em all. Cabbage is $50 a ton, and all we've got is some little knots about as big as a marble. We're livin' on root crops an' blackberries. What can you do?"

THERE is a heaviness everywhere. There is a copper tinge in the sky. There is a molten heat and a stillness and a silence and a something that hangs over all the fields, and paralyzes and burns. What can a man do? Horses stand in their stalls, ready to go out again. The harness cracks from the heat and dryness, but holds. Trace chains clink. Men work through dust and sweat and fiery shafts from the sun. All to what purpose? Fight drought with cultivation? Yes. But it does not seem to do any good.

The women work about the house and are silent. They are thinking, wishing, waiting—waiting for what? Was this the year that would be different, when dreams would come true? It is different. It is too bad to talk about.

Everybody is suffering, the just and the unjust together, with few exceptions. In the West, the cowboys ride in at night, gaunt and saddle-wearied, their clothes clinging to them, their eyes ringed with dirt and deep in their heads, their mouths caked and crusted with dust and sweat. Was this the year that was going to be cool, with plenty of rain and grass and a trip to St. Louis occasionally? Instead, there is dust and hot weather and no rest for the weary—ten miles

SILVER'S MEXICAN EMPIRE TOTTERS

The ambition of every foresighted Spanish prospector was to become mine owner and hacienda proprietor at the same time. Several of those who did, extracting ores at mere labor cost from their own mother lodes and demanding heavy share charges of their competitors, established fortunes which, for their times, were the wonders of the world.

There was Don Pedro Tereros, for instance, who in 1774 took $6,000,000 out of the Veta (vein) de la Soledad near Pachuca, and comparable sums most of the years of his mature lifetime. Don Pedro celebrated his bonanza year by presenting his sovereign Don Carlos III with a 120-gun frigate—equivalent to a first-line battleship in the navies of today—and a loan of $1,000,000 on no-interest terms. Royalty, properly appreciative, promptly gave to Don Pedro the title of Conde de Regla, for it had learned long before that one of their duties to the State was to cash in on the generous impulses of Mexican silver barons who wished to advance themselves socially.

YET, compared to Don Antonio Abregon, the Tereros were scarcely better than pikers. So luckless and poor a prospector in the 1760s that he had been forced to take a partner, Don Antonio stumbled upon mother lode traces in what was to become the Valenciana mine at Guanajuato. Shafts were sunk on money borrowed from a near-by hacienda proprietor, but both the partner and the creditor were bought out before the full scope of the strike became public. For in his own lifetime the Valenciana workings yielded Don Antonio, who shortly, and to the King's profit, became Conde de Valenciana, the then incredible sum of $226,000,000. Remaining a Mexican capitalist all his years rather than a Colonial social adventurer in Europe, Don Antonio became, to the exquisite French aristocrats and the hard-spending British nobility of his era, a kind of mystery man of wealth. They never spoke of his fortune—estimated at the time as the largest in the world—without bated breath and polite envy and a discreet wonder as to what he did with it. As a matter of fact, Don Antonio built a few churches at from $500,000 to $1,000,000 each, spent a good many more millions adorning near and far female relatives with jewelry for Mexican parties, lived in most luxurious style, and still left scores of millions for his heirs of the second and third generations to dissipate.

Then there were the Sardanetas, José and his son Miguel, who in the mid-eighteenth century found new mother lodes in the old Rayas mines at Guanajuato. José died almost in poverty before the prospecting part of this venture was finished. But Miguel, piling up as much as $11,000,000 Rayas silver in his hacienda in one of his more fortunate years, became Marques de Rayas and built a $5,000,000 fantastic castle at the mine mouth, topped with a golden St. Michael. All of this was duly levelled or converted into purchasing power by nineteenth-century revolutionists. The Moncadas outraced him socially, however, by acquiring two titles—Maques del Jaral, from the name of their most profitable "veta," and Conde de San Mateo. Quite inadvertently, their descendants left $140,000 in specie under their kitchen floor in 1815, when they dashed for Spain just ahead of the independence revolutionaries.

But not all the silver nobles had such determined social ambitions or were so uninterruptedly fortunate. Old Zuniga, the muleteer who found the incredibly rich Catorce mine on the borders of Durango and Zacatecas in the late seventeenth century, in his old age used to drop in at the Viceroy's palace at Mexico City during the Branciforte Administration, but not for the court ceremonies. Such high-hat goings-on were not for habitual tortilla-eaters, he would gruffly inform the rigid majordomos; what he came for was to see his little sweethearts. Accordingly, he would be ushered into the nursery of Branciforte's little daughters, and there, sometimes for days at a time, high revelry would be held with the gold dolls and toys which the old man had caused to be made for each visit by his Indian artisans. His extravagances, however, were fairly simple compared with the case of one Medellin, a late seventeenth century silver baron, who gave $630,000 to his godchild.

But the most charming case of silver hunting amid varying fortunes was that of Joseph La Borde, a Frenchman. After gaining riches enough in the Guanajuato field to build a $450,000 church, La Borde in 1743 spent his all sinking new shafts in a vein that had petered out. Calling the Archbishop of Guanajuato into consultation, he received permission to sell a diamond sun from the gift-church tabernacle, which realized $100,000. With this he went over into the Zacatecas territory and eventually, after several nearly ruinous ventures, struck pay rock again in a mine called La Esperanza. During the next twenty years it yielded La Borde several millions for gracious spending and permitted him to leave an estate of $650,000 in specie besides his mine.

The middle eighteenth century, when "Mexican dollars" were the world's international exchange medium, when exploration had been pushed to its furthest limits, and when Mexican mining was still technically abreast of its times in most of its processes, saw the high-water mark of silver's romantic prosperity. Presently, by 1800, the mines with deeper workings were beginning to be overrun with water, and overwhelmed with excessive production costs in comparison with a more efficient Europe, already using steam-driven pumps and less wasteful ore-handling and extraction processes.

When Alexander von Humboldt made his famous 1803-4 visit to the colony, although he admired the underground masonry works of the Mexican mining engineers, the things they could accomplish with mule-power column pumping and the almost inexhaustible richness of the veins, he was quite disagreeable about the useless thirty-foot high galleries which did not intercommunicate, the needless water damage, and scores of other signs of backwardness. Also, although Humboldt and contemporary travelers observed illiterate ladies in the frontier camps wearing $10,000 equipments of jewelry to breakfast, and although silver barons on horseback still wore silver fittings almost as heavy as themselves and lived as lavishly as Oriental sovereigns, silver prosperity was dwindling and historic bonanza mines were closing down because it no longer paid to work them.

Then came the wars of independence, during which nearly every superstructure in Mexico and thousands of underground works were destroyed by the revolutionaries, while loose bullion was carried off to no very definite destination. A few shrewd patriots made a profit on the situation, like the famous General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, who advised his silver baron friends to bury their bullion on his ranch at Manga de Clavo and then, in most instances, profitably denounced the owners to the government as traitors. But, on the whole, independence in 1821 found the silver industry prostrate and most of the Counts and Marqueses of silver extraction voluntary exiles in Spain.

British syndicates bought the old Spanish bonanza mines for a song in the 1820s, and almost at once approached bankruptcy by paying Hollywood salaries to mining engineers who could dig tin in Cornwall well enough, but totally lacked the ability to move boilers and steam engines over the Mexican mountain chains, or to get work out of the Mexican mine laborers. Barely rescued by the lessons of experience, the British stood their ground during the sixty years of almost constant revolution and the great silver depreciation due to enormous productivity developed after the Civil War in the United States.

With the Diaz days many of the British and the surviving Mexican capitalists renounced their grip to the Americans who came with cyanide processes and up-to-date smelting plants and a major interest in copper which reduced silver to a kind of respectable by-product.

BUT it could still be minted into coins, and coins were cash, so that, in good years and bad down to 1930, finding silver was still to the lucky prospector, Mexican or American, the same as finding money. But at this time by the edict of the mining profession whose science it did so much to found, it is to be demoted to a mere by-product trade commodity, and one of rather uncertain value.

Whether such an edict can be carried out in Mexico, where rationalizations are not invariably popular, remains to be seen. But on the American side of the border one result is already obvious. Sitting in "prospectors' row" in the San Jacinto Plaza at El Paso last week, I listened to the old men who for years have been spinning yarns about the great mines they had discovered in the past and the greater strikes they hoped to make. This year they were talking about silver as if it were a positive obstacle rather than an allurement.

AN EMPEROR IN A CENTURY'S RETROSPECT

It is a commonplace that his intellect and his tastes were not above the average. Deep within the great Hofburg he lived in two comparatively plain rooms, a bedroom where he slept in his famous soldier's bed, and a study where, with his spectacles perched on his nose and his diary for the day before him, he spent longer hours at his desk than any of his court officials spent. He had some of the finest chefs and the best-stocked cellars in Europe, but he was content to wash down a simple middle-class diet with homely beer or an Austrian wine. His capital supported the finest symphony orchestra in the world, but he had no ear for music. He never read a book in his life and he never played a game of cards. The only escape which he allowed himself was the old and royal sport of hunting the chamois.

The time came when absolutism ceased to be real, when autocracy became a splendid dream. The State was becoming something vastly more than the dynasty. When he was forced to make his terms with the State he observed them to the letter, but his inner loyalties were to the dynasty. The decency and orderliness of Hapsburg etiquette, which had been the music of the spheres to an older generation, came in time to make the dynasty a thing increasingly unreal, and perhaps it was there that the old Vienna caught some of the unreality which characterized it.

As he grew older he grew lonelier and he consorted with few beyond his young grandchildren and his lifelong friend, Katherine Schratt. He became disillusioned and out of sympathy with all the political parties which were striving for possession of the State. He looked down on a world which was flowing away from him, but his relentless sense of duty kept him at his work even when he began falling asleep in his chair at Cabinet Councils, and his Ministers had to tip-toe from the room to avoid waking him. Late in life he told the Empress Eugenie, "God grants me this long life so that the end of this ancient empire may be delayed a little. After my death it is bound to come."

IT was on July 14, 1789, that the Paris mob stormed the Bastile, and Louis XVI, when he heard of it at Versailles, made one of the most pathetic remarks in all history: "Why, this is a revolt!" It has taken more than a century for the forces of democracy and nationalism which were released by the fall of the Bastile, to do their work in Europe, and even now their end has not been reached. In the lifetime of the generation now living, those forces have won greater victories than any which Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette were to witness in the few years of life that remained to them. Louis XVI was too close to the event to understand that the fall of the Bastile was not a revolt. "No, Sire, it is a revolution."

From Marie Antoinette to Francis Joseph may seem at first a long trail, but in reality it is short and direct. Her death under the guillotine in 1793 made the French Revolution a more personal shock to the Hapsburgs in Vienna than to any other dynasty in Europe excepting only the Bourbons themselves. It made the Hapsburgs the leaders of European reaction, and it was that rôle which Francis Joseph inherited when the 1848 revolution chased the great Metternich from Vienna, compelled the feeble Ferdinand to abdicate and brought his 18-year-old nephew to the toppling throne. The evil day was at hand. Every throne in Europe was on the point of falling. But the young Francis Joseph smashed the revolution with a ferocity that saved autocracy for another seventy years. Despite all the lesser disasters which he encountered, it was largely he who put off the evil day from 1848 to 1918.

Ten years after 1848 he lost Lombardy to the Italians. Eight years after that Bismarck rolled him in the dust and thrust him out of the German confederation, seizing the leadership of the German family for Prussia. Then came the compromise with Hungary which opened a constitutional régime based on the two most compact populations in the realm, the Magyars and Germans. From that day the Magyars were the dominating partner. They had won a lasting fame as champions of liberty in Europe, but liberty in the eyes of the Magyar nobility was not a boon to be wasted on Slavs. As for the German partner in the dual monarchy, Austrian liberalism became very marked in the years before the war. The Emperor had made his terms with constitutionalism and he was faithful to his word. But at heart his distrust of Parliaments never left him.

Standing above the political parties, he played them off one against another with the sole purpose of preserving the dynasty. He even went to the length of approving universal suffrage in order to gain a new element to play off against all the parties. "Believe me," he told Field Marshal Conrad late in life, "believe me, it is impossible to rule this realm constitutionally."

If he had been younger when Serbian nationalism struck down his heir at Serajevo he probably would have found means of averting war. But once war came he remained loyal to his German ally. "If the monarchy must fall to the ground, let it at least fall honorably," he said. One of the few mercies which fate granted him was to spare him the sight of the fall when at last it came.

Deaf Hear Again Through New Aid

Earpiece No Bigger Than Dime Wins Enthusiastic Following Ten-Day Free Trial Offer

After twenty-five years devoted exclusively to the manufacture of scientific hearing-aids, the Dictograph Products Co., Inc., Dept. 265 M, 220 West 42nd Street, New York, N. Y., has just perfected a new model Acousticon that represents the greatest advance yet made in the re-creation of hearing for the deaf. This latest Acousticon is featured by a tiny earpiece no bigger than a dime. Through this device sounds are clearly and distinctly transmitted to subnormal ears with wonderful benefit to hearing and health alike. The makers offer an absolutely free trial for 10 days to any person who may be interested, and a letter will bring one of these remarkable aids to your home for a thorough and convincing test. Send them your name and address today!—Advt.

trailing a herd to water one day, ten miles trailing them back the next; to grass where there is no grass, to water which is nothing but soupy mud. Maybe the cattle can skim a mouthful from the surface.

"'Minds me o' 1902,'' says a garrulous rider. "The Governor of the State went to see Colonel Blank, and he says: 'Colonel, what can I do for you?' An' the Colonel didn't say nothin' but what he'd been sayin'—'By God, I want grass! I want grass!' An' it didn't rain an' it didn't rain. An' the Colonel shipped some o' his stuff to Louisiana and some even to Cuba, they tell me. But it broke him.

"Yeah, we're feedin' some, five carloads o' cake a day. Boss says he can keep it up till the tenth day o' August. Then we'll have to put the wheels under 'em—let 'em ride to market. An' I'll be lookin' for a job. They tell me you can buy grown cows down south o' here for five an' ten dollars a head. I don't know. When drought hits the cow country it's hell on wheels, I'm tellin' ya."

IN the old South things are somewhat better. Cotton can flourish under drought conditions. Water is the thing that causes plant growth; absence of it causes fruiting and holds down the weevil. So there'll be a normal crop, but the price has gone almost to nothing. Of course there is no hay and the corn is almost burnt up. "We'll be buying feed by November. It looks to me like one o' dem years when de Cap'n call you in an' say: 'Boys, ef you got any gunny sacks on de place you better be savin' 'em. An' you say: 'How come, Cap'n?' An' he say: "Well, you kin cut a hole in 'em foh yore haid, an' two more foh yore ahms an' tie a string aroun' 'em an' call 'em clothes, can't you?' An' you scratch yore haid an' say: 'Yeah, Cap'n, but what 'bout somepin to go to church in?' An' he say: 'You got some ole overalls, ain't you?' 'Yes.' 'Well, save dem foh Sunday!' "

Of course some sections are doing better. The Black Lands can live on cheap cotton. The Black Belt of Alabama is diversified. Georgia got off a good watermelon crop, but her sweet potatoes are ruined. Some of the tobacco is standing up, but the burley regions have lost hope. The blue-grass is hard hit. There will not be a seed crop of blue-grass this year and no third cutting of alfalfa.

But here and there, no matter where you go, is the highly exceptional farmer who makes a crop, year in, year out, by reason of good tillage, good husbandry, good farming. His cattle are not starving. His implements are the latest type. His soil is in good tilth. He is not worried. But the chances are that even he is running in the red this year. He is buying feed, too. Sections that have feed for sale are finding trucks at the warehouses at all hours of the day and night, trucks from adjoining States, manned by weary farmers with money in their hands.

"Here! Here's the cash! We want feed! On this truck! Right now! We can't wait for the railroads!"

Unwilling to believe that the drought could extend so long, they have waited, until now they have to buy in a hurry to save their live stock. They have experienced drought before. But this is unusual.

"Yes," says the Middle Westerner. "You fellows out West may be used to it. Shoot, I had a brother out there who said he didn't see it rain from the Fourth of July till a year from the following Christmas. And he wasn't blind, either. But we don't know anything about that. We've never done any Summer fallowing in our lives. We're lookin' for fifteen inches o' rain by this time of year anyway. And we've only got five so far in some of our counties. Ten inches behind, and tryin' to make a livin' out o' farmin'!

"What can you do? There isn't a crop you can put in this time o' year an' get anything out of it. Looks like the drought ought to cut down the milk supply an' raise the price. But the people in town talk like they're hard-up too. They aren't buyin' an' the price has fallen off. Expect me to milk cows and tote the milk in for the price they're payin', which won't even pay labor? Not me! I'm a beef man myself. I like black cattle. And it's done quit bein' a question of how to keep 'em fat, but just how to keep 'em alive, that's all! I had to take 'em off my grass, an' they ate the woods pasture out in three days.

"It was all burnt up anyway. I turned 'em down the creek an' saw 'em eatin' leaves off the trees. So I took my axe an' cut down some trees an' the cattle came runnin' to 'em just like the bees were in 'em. They've been livin' on leaves for two weeks now. Tim Black said two o' his cows died, an' he cut 'em open an' found nothin' but dirt in their stomachs, dirt that they'd got reaching for the roots o' grass. He shipped the rest o' his, but didn't get nothin' for 'em. Market was loaded—14,000 head that day. Everybody's unloadin', even their breedin' stock. They can't keep 'em alive any longer.

"I've been on this farm fifty-eight years, an' my daddy owned it before me. I bought the Smith place joinin', an' that gives me three good wells and a spring. Last week, the last one went dry—first time I ever heard of it being that way. I'm haulin' water from an old deep well in the swamp. Other folks are too. When that gives out, we'll have to go to town for water. Some are goin' there now.

"Don't know what we're comin' to. Spotted rains are goin' around, but missin' us, sure as you're born. Talked to a fellow from Twin Creek Valley the other day; said it started to rain while he was in church, an' he ran right out in it, Sunday clothes an' all, an' said, 'Come on, rain. You're worth a dollar a gallon to me. I just dare you get me wet.' But it quit mighty shortly.

"Reckon we'll make it through somehow, or maybe somehow else. We can't tell from here. Folks are sayin' that we'd better cut out three months of school an' take the money and feed people with it. I don't know. One fellow down our way says it's just naturally up to the county to buy clothes for his kids, because he can't do it. I don't know. It sounds funny to me. But he's hard hit.

THE hardest things are the fires. Somebody throws a match in a fence corner and fire gets out an' takes the buildings an' the barns an' everything. That's a pretty near the end, see? Went to one of them fires the other night. An' the woman was standin' there cryin' an' cryin.' She rushed up to my youngest boy—he weighs about 100 pounds, no bigger 'n a toothpick—an' she says, 'Oh, buddy, please move that piano that they just brought out.' Poor woman. We moved it for her.

"And folks that have worked all their lives long—worked hard, slaved—are losing their farms, or are going to lose them. Nobody 'round here can meet a payment this year. But what are you goin' to do?

"I don't know. The Chambers of Commerce are stirring around trying to ease things for us. And it's nice of 'em. Fact of the matter, they've moved tax delinquent day along some, an' if wheat'll just go up a little, I reckon I can make out some way to pay 'em. An' they're figurin' out some new ways of financing. But lending more money around here to raise 70-cent wheat—why that's just like givin' a man more rope to hang himself with. If they could arrange things to get bread down to a nickel a loaf, wouldn't that be better?

"Yes, and supplying more credit to buy hay at $33 a ton when milk wholesales at 4 cents a quart—why that would break the Bank of England. And I'm tellin' you: right now butchers are buying lamb at 2 and 3 cents a pound an' selling it out at 50 cents. One leg over the counter will pay for the whole carcass. Now if we could just figure out some way to tackle that problem.

"Down in Blank County the farmers petitioned the County Commissioners to give 'em work on the roads. The commissioners appropriated $100,000 dollars. They don't pay but $2.50 a day an' $4.50 for a team and driver. It ain't so much. But those fellows say you don't have to take it if you don't want to. Believe me, they're takin' it.

"Seems like if you can't make it one way, maybe you can another. I reckon we'll get by somehow."

THE HOUSES OF SANTA FE

of fitness, a feeling that they are as truly a part of the country as the wide horizons or the pale tan grass.

First of all, this is an architecture of mass. Big or little, individual dwelling or whole town, these buildings look as if they had been modeled out of a single lump of clay. They sit on their hill sites like squat stone gods, immobile, contemplative, ageless. It is difficult to realize that they were built up bit by bit, so surely do they seem a thing that fingers have shaped and modeled. There is about them no suggestion of a preliminary framework, no feeling of an interior bony structure hidden beneath the surface. They are the exact opposites of the steel skeletons veiled in masonry which are New York's proud contribution to modern architecture. In one sense there is nothing modern about them, for their fundamental characteristics were developed anywhere from 400 to 1,000 years ago. Yet in the geometric quality of their composition, in their use of planes and angles, their satisfying sense of bulk, they arouse in modern artists a vivid enthusiasm.

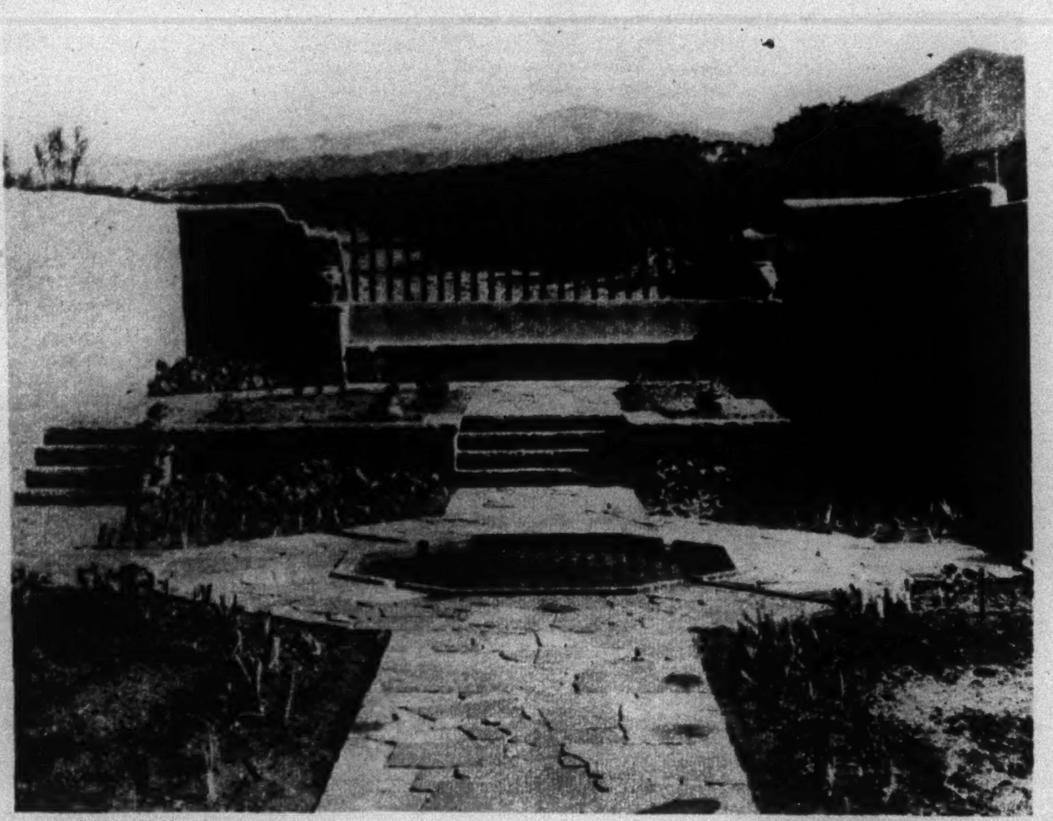
THEIR feeling of a modeled mass, the fluid line, the sense of roundness, the quality of giving delight to the eye from any angle, arises out of the way they are built. Their materials are the clay, the rock, the wood about them, their builders people who made one feel that the landscape has flowered into humans. For some reason which no one knows, the Pueblos are the only Indians in this country who discovered that walls may be made to stand upright like a man. How they graduated from the wigwam stage no one knows. Scientists think that it was necessity and the construction of the country. Tribes were warlike, life was dangerous, the country abrupt. In order to achieve a certain measure of tranquillity, the Bear peoples, for example, would climb to the top of a mesa and pull their ladders up after them. Space on top was limited, conical houses were wasteful of it. So people drew their homes closer and closer together as the tribe grew, flattened their curves to the shortest distance between two points, and eventually built their walls along a straight line.

The way in which they constructed their fortified mesas still presents problems to be solved, but the method of a modern Indian with a single house has been watched and noted down. First he decides on the size of his floor plan and lays stones at the four corners. Then he goes to the chief and gets four eagle feathers specially prepared and blessed. These he puts under the four stones. Then he decides where his door is to go and sets a bit of food on each side of it. Having propitiated the gods he is ready to build. His walls go up stone by stone, or in country where there is no soft stone to be found they are built of adobes—bricks made out of clay mixed with straw and manure and dried in the sun. When they are high enough he stretches beams of cottonwood or cedar across from wall to wall, crosses them with a layer of smaller poles, crosses those with rush or grass and tramps mud in until he has closed every crack. Then the final coating of mud is patted onto the walls by the hands of Indian women and tramped into the roofs by bare feet. Sometimes the house is washed with white gypsum, sometimes not.

The way Indians build today is the way they were building when Coronado led his men in here in 1540, almost a century before the first Pilgrim came ashore at Plymouth Rock. Even then it had resulted in two types of towns and the same two types still exist within easy reach of Santa Fe. Santa Clara pueblo, for instance, whose women make black pottery, is a town on a plain, built about a hollow square. The houses touch edges and their blank rear walls form a protective fortification against all intruders. The area of the town is necessarily limited by the ground plan, but additions to the population can always be accommodated by building the daughter's house on top of the mother's and in this way Santa Clara has begun to go up one story. The roofs then become terraces and families use them for vantage points and safety stations. When the drums beat and the gift dance thumps in the court below, all the women and children withdraw to the roofs and sit through the day in blanketed mounds while the men stamp on the earth beneath.

THE GARDEN OF A HOME IN SANTA FE



Photograph by Ansel E. Adams.

Taos is a much older town, more complex and with a history of many battles. There the houses are piled several stories deep, with crooked ladders leading from one level to another like modern equivalents of the miraculous cane by which the first Indians are said to have emerged from mournful regions deep in the earth to the sunshine and the starlight.

In both these types, and in the fortified mesas which are mostly ruins now, the method of building and the unconscious artistry of the workers produced those effects which charm even tourists who claim no knowledge of art. Always there is the sense of satisfaction that arises from handicraft well done, always the charm of mass, of walls that are solid without being rigid, of angles that never insist on being right.

Santa Fe itself, though Indians may at one time have built on its site, was founded officially by the Spaniards in 1609 and dubbed the Royal Town of the Holy Faith of St. Francis. Here the Indian workmen built a great fortified palace for the Governor and a church to the glory of God. Part of the palace still stands beside the plaza, but the church disappeared when the Indians took the town in 1680. The much smaller church of San Miguel which was built in 1636 is still in active use, and all over town there are houses built throughout the three centuries of Spanish domination, thick old adobe walls, and ruined buildings incorporated into the modern city. Thus Santa Fe has within itself the legitimate nucleus of the architectural style which bears its name.

POINCARE RENEWS A CAREER AT SEVENTY

Poincaré's coming into power with his reputation as an honest man and a clean political leader untarnished gave back confidence to the country. Herriot, Painleve, and the moderate leaders of the Radical party had accepted office with him. There was a strong following wind behind the new Cabinet, and it sailed along merrily. Money began to flow back into the country, taxes were collected. A low rate franc had given business a boost, for production costs were far below the world rate. France was started on that road to recovery which has, in such a short time, carried her to the position of a country with the largest gold store per head of population of any country in the world.

THE wind perhaps blew too strong in the sails. Poincaré certainly, when he started, hoped he would be able to revalorize the franc near its pre-war value of five to the dollar. As a bourgeois, his sympathies were all with those people of all classes but mostly of the middle class who had put their savings into French rentes and who had patriotically and with faith lent money to the government. But events proved too strong for him. First it became obvious that revalorization at pre-war value or anything like it would place a burden of debt on the country that might be got rid of by what would be but need not be called partial bankruptcy. Then the business world clamored for stabilization at a rate which the franc had reached, near twenty-five to the dollar. Regretfully but honestly the Premier accepted the inevitable and stabilized.

Last Summer he had to face a second decision which he would have preferred not to make. The date by which the Berenger-Mellon agreement had to be ratified was fast approaching. Once he had avoided the issue. This time he had a new Parliament, but it was a Parliament which had been elected on the cry for a revision of the debt settlements. If his health had stood the strain, it is quite certain that Poincaré would have gone courageously enough along the road which events had forced on him. In reality it was Briand and Cheron who had to take upon themselves the onus and hard work of getting the act of ratification passed.

These two measures, which, before he took office, he had declaimed against, came into force by that logic of events which he seems never able to avoid; first, the franc was stabilized at a price which has been already proved was far below what would have been possible, and second, those debt settlements, which he had always refused to recognize as just, were accepted and have proved no such burden as was anticipated.

For several years now Poincaré has been out of office. From an invalid's chair and next from a journalist's desk he has been noting and commenting on the doings of his successors in office. Events have moved fast. Premier Tardieu has planned to use for the good of the country as a whole those great accumulations which the treasury had hoarded up during his predecessor's Premiership. One can scarcely believe that Poincaré quite approves. Neither does he approve that wide, generous ambition of Briand to try to draw Europe into a cooperative union and away from its bitter nationalisms. So far, however, Poincaré has refrained from anything which might look, except in the eyes of those who wish to find it there, like an attack upon his successors. His writings are never passionate, never polemical. It is known nevertheless that between him and Tardieu there is not the same close cooperation that there was in the early days of the latter's Ministry. The younger man has his own ideas, his own plans, and has plenty of self-confidence. In the Chamber corridors, when the prospects of the present Cabinet are discussed, there is always only one conclusion. It will last just as long as Poincaré does not feel ready to retake office. This Chamber was elected under his aegis. That is one of the sources of its weakness, for its party divisions were all broken down and the test question for candidates was, "Are you with or against Poincaré?" There is still a Poincaré majority, much larger and more to the Left than that which Tardieu holds with some difficulty.

The country trusts Poincaré never to be adventurous, never to try to go too fast or too far. If Premiers had nicknames now (as in former days Kings were called Charles the Bold and Louis the Quarrelsome), Poincaré would be dubbed "Poincaré the Very Prudent." That is what he is and that is what France likes him for.

McARTHUR'S CAREER

either on the battlefied or the athletic field.

Not long ago it was whispered in certain groups—especially in Manila, where General MacArthur was in command—that he harbored political ambitions, and it was quite openly hinted that he wished to be Governor General of the Philippines, graduating thence into the Cabinet as Secretary of War or Secretary of State. General MacArthur's popularity with certain Filipinos in high positions—noticeably Manuel Quezon—probably gave rise to the idea that he coveted the job as Governor General. But as far as the army has been able to discover, Douglas MacArthur is first, last and all the time a soldier.

MacArthur's courage has come through many acid tests. In addition to the Distinguished Service Cross with Oak-leaf Cluster, he received seven silver-star citations for acts of gallantry in France. Add to this imposing array of decorations numerous foreign medals and our own Distinguished Service Medal bestowed upon him and then, for good measure, mention that he wears two wound chevrons, and we know that his courage is true as steel.

Stories spring up around soldiers faster than they do about other men whose days are set in less spectacular efforts. There are stories around Douglas MacArthur. Behind them all is the germ of truth, but in many the details have, perhaps, become a bit distorted. One such story was brought back by a member of Secretary Baker's party upon its return from France after having visited the front there. It was reported in several newspapers that MacArthur, then a Colonel, had joined a party of French soldiers, had stormed a German trench, and that MacArthur was next seen leading by the ear a towering Bavarian officer and swinging his riding crop, which was his only weapon. It is quite certain that MacArthur would be the last person to humiliate an honorable enemy, and it is also quite certain that, if necessary, other more potent means of persuasion than tweaking a prisoner's ear were near at hand.

It has been said that General MacArthur is something of an expert on economy and that his appointment will usher in certain retrenchments and economies that Mr. Hoover thinks are badly needed in the military establishment. There is probably little to this. The appointment was undoubtedly made because the man has a brilliant record and the President wanted him.

General MacArthur faces his greatest task. He will find the army behind him. He will find the heartaches of the older and disappointed Major Generals gone and the assertion of that fine esprit and discipline that genuine soldiers give loyally to their superiors. They will feel, after all, like singing:

The Corps! Bareheaded salute it,
With eyes up, thanking our God
That we of the Corps are treading
Where they of the Corps have trod.

FANS OF YESTERYEAR.

WHAT has become of the old palm leaf fans so popular a few years ago? Comparatively few are seen nowadays, whereas formerly vendors sold hundreds of them at every circus, country fair, Fourth of July parade and to the homes. In a great many houses there would be a palm leaf fan for every member of the family and extra ones for guests. They could be bought anywhere for a dime. On front door steps and back porches fans were wielded constantly and consistently during the hot days of Summer. In the Autumn they were gathered up and packed away for another year.

TIDES THAT LASH MANHATTAN'S CANYONS

The Current of Toilers Swirls Higher Daily, Its Ebb at Dusk Depleting the Crowded Island

By H. I. BROCK

NEW YORK'S history as a city with a tidal population goes back to the lumbering days of the Dutch burghers who did business along the Heere Graght—the Grand Canal—which was Broad Street in its Nieuw Amsterdam aspect of a waterway. It began when those well-breeched traders formed the habit of trekking back and forth to their bouweries, or farms, beyond the common cow pasture where the City Hall now stands for the giving away of keys of the city to notable outland visitors and others. From those days, well over 250 years ago, New York has tended to be more and more a place of commuters, and the human tides, sweeping back and forth each day, have become mightier and mightier, until now our miraculous forests of heaven-piercing hollow towers is engulfed in the monster many-headed flood every morning and in the evening by the ebb is left a vast acreage of piled-up vacancy.

In the first era of the republic those solid citizens were commuters who resided in St. John's Square, Varick Street. Then the rush hours, as we say—the hours of maximum ebb and flow—were between 12 o'clock noon and 3 in the afternoon. For that was when the tired business men went home to dinner. Distances were not so magnificent in those days, and John Jacob Astor, a merchant of note, engaged in the traffic in furs (our oldest and one of our most persistent industries), used to walk, his way lying north from Wall Street along Broadway.

In 1837 the first great "slump in the market" should have checked the mushroom growth of a city which, in the fifty-odd years since Sir Guy Carleton marched his redcoats out of it, in order to let General George Washington march his bluecoats in, had doubled its population four times Instead, the population was still piling up and spreading out. Presently stages and tinkling horse-cars were extending the commuting radius to Washington and Madison Squares and to Stuyvesant Square, Gramercy Park and Murray Hill. Little dinky steam engines, puffing back and forth on tracks set on stilts, next took up the task and brought Harlem within reach. The elevated, arriving in the 1870s, and not the subway, which had to wait till the first decade of the twentieth century, was the real beginning of New York's "rapid transit," the mechanism through which the tidal movements of her population are made possible on a great scale and over long distances. The leap to Harlem was the first long leap.

By that time, the tidal flow and ebb was in the morning and the evening and not at midday. What had been a sleepy congeries of villages for stay-at-homes became a teeming suburb. Harlem was transformed into a residential quarter for white-collar families whose heads worked down town. It had not yet got to be the custom for the whole family to commute to work. Otherwise, the parallel is complete with the process which, since the opening of the big bridge and the tubes to that borough, has made a swarming suburb of the recently more or less leafy villages of Queens. It is one of these last communities, by the way, which proudly points to a 1,300 per cent increase of population in the last ten years.

The elevated had not long been operating before the old city of New York—the city to which Manhattan Island furnished the spacious rural background—the part of the present city between the Battery and the City Hall, that is to say—was discovered to have suffered the fate which, the figures of the last two censuses show, has finally overtaken the entire island—intensively urbanized and become since 1898 the Borough of Manhattan.

PRECISELY what has just happened to Manhattan and precisely what fifty years ago began to happen to old New York was this: The number of people from outside who came in every weekday morning to do business and went out again every night was greater than the number of people who lived there regularly. And the first lot was gaining steadily on the second lot. Old New York had lost population to the other quarters of the island—to uptown and the west side and Harlem and the other more open spaces—just as Manhattan has lost to the outlying boroughs containing more open spaces.

By the end of the first decade of our present century the Old City was a desolation of empty streets and deserted buildings by night and a swarming hive by day. In the morning the swelling human tide flowed in and was swallowed up by great box-like piled-up tiers of offices—forerunners of our skyscrapers. In the evening the human flood was disgorged and the outrushing tide distributed itself in streams along lines of transit which grew ever more numerous as bridges, subways, tunnels and bus lines were added to the already existing agencies of transport—trolleys, L's and ferries, not to omit conveyances of luxury and privilege on wheels or afloat, from taxicabs to power yachts.

The writer of this can remember when the full tide seemed to sweep in with accumulated and concentrated impetus upon that mile-long tip of the island—the Old City. From Harlem it came, and from Brooklyn and from Jersey. Most furiously, both in the ebb and flow, the rush of it beat and swirled about the entrance of Brooklyn Bridge. There has never been in all our herded traffic a fury like it or an impact so terrifying. When the other bridges across the East River came, and the subways and the tubes; when first one business and then another that had stayed downtown moved up into midtown; when that centripetal inrushing tide was distributed all the way up to Forty-second Street and then to Fifty-ninth and beyond: then began the process which has caused Manhattan, descending from its peak of population in 1911, to lose almost half a million residents.

From that time all the island south of Central Park has been swept daily by the flow and ebb of a tide of workers—of one sort and another. This tide spreads out on the ebb more and more widely over the marginal regions of the city and into the neighboring country, as the electric railway, the gas bus and the taxi and private motor car have multiplied the old five-mile radius into a fifty-mile radius. And as it covers more country on the ebb, it piles up more and more prodigiously in the canyons of the city into which it rolls on the flood, spurting up from underground channels.

The famous towers of Manhattan, climbing ever higher toward that goal at which the shining silver needle of the Chrysler points aspiringly, are symbols of the striving ping horses in midstream without getting their feet wet. The whole course of English history is a series of these delicate and difficult adjustments. In Scotland it is different. Once upon a time an Englishman failed to hole his putt on a Scottish links and complained to his caddie that "no gentleman would have asked me to hole a thing like that." "Maybe so," said his caddie, "but ye see we're nae gentlemen here. We're juist gowffers."

THE point of this entirely true story is the fact that the caddie did not smile. His expression did not change by the breadth of a single whisker. It is true that he was a St. Andrews caddie and the caddies of St. Andrews are perhaps the most terrifying caddies in all Scotland. He was so old that you had only to train ivy over him to convert him into a grand Caledonian ruin eligible for preservation by the State as a historical monument. But in his dour solemnity he was merely typical of the Scots. It must not be assumed, of course, that the caddies of St. Andrews are incapable of humor. Far from it. It is their withering, devastating irony which makes them so terrifying.

Mere harmless levity is not the meat on which these venerable giants have been nurtured. How the rest of the world can bring itself to refer to golf in a spirit of weak frivolity no Scot ever understands. Most Scots have heard that jokes have sometimes been made on the subject of golf in foreign countries and that some of these jokes—the golf widow, the broken club, the lost ball, the old woman knitting on the seventh green, and so forth—have attained a considerable age and a wide currency. Some Scots have even seen a recent film in which a piece of tanglefoot flypaper blows across the green just as a rich American golfer, attired in the most reckless plaids, is on the point of driving. The flypaper sticks to his teed ball, the ball is disentangled and teed up again, and the golfer drives off with a tremendous swipe. The ball is then completely lost sight of until somebody comes along with sufficient presence of mind to find it sticking to the head of the club.

The Scots understand that this kind of trifling is regarded in foreign countries as comic. In connection with a mere game, tennis for example, it is possible that they might be able to understand it, but in connection with an exercise which has the right to describe itself as royal and ancient it seems to the Scot to be as unthinkable as a comic sermon in the kirk.

It is hopeless to try to change such people. For better or worse, you have to take them as they are. You may grumble at the crowds on their links and if you refrain from grumbling at their caddies it is only because these dominating ancients have frightened you out of your slender wits. Scottish caddies are like Scottish preachers. You may like them or you may not. They are frequently great men and they are sometimes great nuisances. Which they prove to be depends less on your game than on whether you prove to be "mindful" when your game is ended.

The trouble is that the tipping system is a thing to which no Scot should ever be exposed. An English caddie, in the presence of a tip, rarely forgets the humble place in the hierarchy of English life to which it has pleased Heaven to assign him. But who has ever seen a humble Scot? The Scots have never known the old and inborn restraints of feudalism and it is unlikely that the terrible Scottish caddie will ever be tamed as long as the tipping system endures on Scottish links. The ordinary Scottish golfer of course makes no attempt to cope with his brother Scots in the caddies' paddock. He caddies for himself.

As for the crowds on Scottish links, in the season they would amount to a traffic jam if it were not that everybody is moving in the same direction in a great endless stream, moving all day from dawn to dark at the same regular, easy pace. They say that at St. Andrews it takes you three hours to get round in the season, an hour and a quarter to the turn and an hour and three-quarters coming home.

When you approach the subject of the links themselves, such caviling as you may do at some aspects of Scottish golf dies away into an awed hush. It is by virtue of its wonderful old links, with their soft turf, their sand dunes and the open sea creaming on the beaches beyond, that Scotland is the Mecca of golf. It is from such surroundings that the gospel of golf has been carried to the uttermost ends of the earth, for here the faith burns at white heat.

It is difficult to hit upon any handy grouping which will include all the great links of Scotland, for the whole country is edged with an almost continuous chain of fine links. No more wonderful turf or more ideal surroundings are to be found anywhere. But its world-famous links group themselves almost automatically around three centres. St. Andrews on the Fifeshire coast is of course a whole group in itself, with lesser satellites lying up and down the shore to north and south of it. North Berwick on the East Lothian coast is the centre of a second group, which includes Muirfield, one of the finest of them all.

And then, over on the west coast, where the turf is softer and more carpetlike, the coast of Ayrshire is the Golf Coast itself. Most golfers regard Prestwick on the Ayrshire coast as the most wonderful natural seaside course in the world, but there is less big golf played there now than formerly, because the crowds that follow championship matches are now so big that no stewards could handle them at the narrow parts of the course. This grouping of Scotland's most famous links around St. Andrews, North Berwick and Prestwick omits the inland courses, and two of these, the Gleneagles courses, carved out of wild moorland, and the Braid Hills courses at Edinburgh, must not be omitted under any circumstances. Braid Hills, the "golf for goats" course of forty years ago, is today the most famous municipal course anywhere in the world, and it would probably be true to describe it also as the world's most popular course.

With such links, it is small wonder that the Scots have converted the world's upper and upper middle classes to golf. It is perhaps inevitable that they should now be converting the world's proletariat to golf. When they have succeeded in that, what will they do with us next? The answer is not difficult, for you can never change the Scots and you can never escape them. The next thing they do will be to put down the lid on Sunday golf on the plea that the greens need one day's rest in seven. And when they have done that they will have the world spending its Sundays as Scotland itself spends its Sundays—strolling over a golf links without a club or a ball, sadly addressing every blade of grass by its maiden name. Perhaps you don't believe it. Wait and see.

MODERN OBJECTS FOR THE HOME

enamel work that decorates the flat cover of the teapot and sugar bowl.

The silver and gold work of Emil Lettré of Berlin discloses in tea sets, platters and jewelry the originality that is inspired by the spirit of the classic Greek in its simplicity of form. To satisfy him a piece of silverware not only must look well but it must also give to the touch a certain satisfaction, for the fingers may feel subtleties of form as well as the eye may see them.

OTHER designers in Germany keep within much stricter limitations the spontaneous play of fancy which creates the unusual and sometimes fantastic design. The use to which the object is to be put is always in mind in the designing and making. Forms are employed that suggest the machine and the industrial age of today. The machine itself is used frankly as an aid wherever possible, even on essentially hand-made products. It is also obvious that the technique and forms imposed on articles produced in large quantities supply motives for hand-made silver.

In this field lies the work of Christian Dell of Frankfort, who seeks in the world of today for motifs for his interesting pieces. His versatility enables him to design also for factory production, especially lighting fixtures and table lamps. As a teacher in the arts and crafts school of Frankfort, part of his work is to develop in his students not only the ability to make pieces of beautiful silverware by hand, but also to cooperate with industry in the making of designs and models that may be produced in quantities. Several lamps of his, especially adapted for the office desk, show an entirely new approach to the problem of creating a fixture that will be light, easily moved and arranged to direct the illumination just where it is wanted. These new desk lamps are made of plated metal and also of bakelite.

Of course, while lighting fixtures of this extreme utilitarian type may appear to be too stark in line and to lack the traditional gracefulness which has so far always been an integral part of decorative furnishings, there are other kinds of wall and ceiling lights in the modern vogue in which much of the new lighting equipment in Germany is found. Curiously enough, one finds an old-fashioned device revived—the suspended light that may be raised or lowered. This may have a circular shade of silk shielding the electric bulbs, or it may be a fixture of brass or silvered arms gracefully spreading out from a centre stem.

In many cases the lighting fixture, instead of being suspended by the old-fashioned chain, is held by a single cord. Wall lights as well as ceiling lights are thus suspended and may be raised or lowered above a couch or a chair where one sits to read. In some of the interiors of Otto Firle of Berlin combinations of glass and metal as well as silk are used in the shades. In a dining room chandelier the several suspended lamp bulbs have loose silk shades hanging down around them. Other of Firle's interiors show a simple paper shade with the lower opening filled in with a very thin silk, thus shielding the bulbs and giving the illumination a soft glow.

A suggestion of the important part that proper interior decoration plays in health and happiness has been brought out this Summer in the several model cottages erected in the Hygiene Exposition now being held at Dresden. Posters of the exhibition are to be seen all over Germany. The connection between health and decoration may have seemed a little tenuous to some visitors to that section of the exposition. However, types of furniture that were easily kept clean and room arrangements which gave the greatest amount of space for ease of movement of the family seemed to be sought for, although not every interior achieved that end.

HOME STUDY COURSE

Practical Training by New Simple Method

To meet the increasing demand for those who cannot attend our New York classes, we have arranged a practical and delightful Home Study Course. The subjects covered and method are the same as our resident classes, with regular members of our New York Faculty giving personal attention and constructive help to each student. Our unique methods have placed this school in a pre-eminent position. The course requires no previous training and progresses easily step by step. A few hours weekly in your spare time will give you the fundamentals of decoration for use in your own home or for complete professional preparation. Our new free booklet describes the unusual opportunities in decorating and gives full details of the course.

to keep the city's head above a tide that rises year by year, till, as the waves of it are dashed into spray against the curtained walls of our strong steel cages, one fancies that it might at any time burst through that barrier and swamp and submerge even so tall a city as ours. Besides, if Manhattan is to face the force of all this heaving swing as it comes and goes, Manhattan must stand up high enough to command the outward reaches to which the tide returns and from which it comes rushing again to the assault.

As a matter af fact, the view from our tallest watchtowers on a very clear day reaches effectually no further than the practical limit of our commuting. Literally the watchman on the highest tower might sweep with his spyglass the converging lines of rails and roadways and pick out the procession of little rushing things upon them, all pointed his way. He would not, of course, be able to measure very closely the momentum of the human mass which would presently hit the steep sides of his citadel. But the view has elements of grandeur. And it is one which allows the imagination to have full play.

IN those rough, round numbers which statisticians hate to have us use, Manhattan has emerged from the latest Federal census with a population 150,000 souls short of 2,000,000. Let's make the figure still rounder and rougher and call it 2,000,000. Estimates of the movements of the tidal population are commonly arrived at by getting the people in charge of all the means of transport to check up on the tickets sold each day, the number of nickels dropped into subway and municipal ferry turnstiles, and all that sort of thing. A fairly recent canvas seemed to show that the daily turnover of fares was more than 6,000,000. That would mean a high tide of something like 3,000,000 individuals going and coming daily. In other words, supposing the population of upper Manhattan to be still in the commuting class as regards downtown and midtown, the actual tide impinging upon Manhattan from outside is reduced to something between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 a day as a top.

We get thus a figure for the tidal flow easily in excess of the total resident population of the island. But for our purposes—and all practical purposes—that part of northern Manhattan which is used like any other outlying residential district and serves as a commuting base, is to be treated like any similar region in Brooklyn, the Bronx, Queens or Richmond. It furnishes its full quota to the tidal wave of people which rushes into the region south of Central Park and down the backbone of that region to Bowling Green, assembling its forces from north, south, east and west. The composite flood consists in these days to a rather alarming degree of white collar people. To be sure, middling white collar people are the natural commuters. They follow in the wake of the unco' rich who are the commuters de luxe, with yachts for the ferry from the north shore of Long Island and airplanes to bring more distant points within the radius.

Streams back and forth contributing their share to the grand daily total of the ebb and flow are, in the nature of things, more or less variable. The tide to Wall Street is a steady flow back and forth, fed from all around. The tide to the region of Forty-second Street is likewise a steady flow back and forth. But this region, as the habitat of the theatres and the happy hunting ground of the night life, has a double set of tides in every twenty-four hours. It has the daytime ebb and flow, spreading out into all the suburbs. It has the nighttime ebb and flow spreading out into all the suburbs also, but complicated with heavy local tides within the main body of the town itself—tides created by the going and coming about their after-dark pursuits of the several hundreds of thousands who do not commute anywhere and of the other hundreds of thousands of residents and transients in hotels.

INTO the western part of this region flows, in addition, the great tide from Williamsburg and Brownsville, which is swallowed up each day by those vast new piles of lofts that make up Garmentaria—the domain of the cloak and suit trade. This development is held considerably responsible for the falling off of Manhattan's population. For the loft buildings replaced many old tenements in which people of modest means, or of extra economic tastes, could still manage to live and did live. The process of eliminating these west side tenements is a continuing process which the building of the subway under Eighth Avenue has encouraged and which the opening of that subway will expedite.

An increasing tendency to put manufacturing plants in this general region of midtown, toward the Hudson River, might well result in creating here another of those spaces, reserved, like the Wall Street bailiwick, as a place in the daytime for a special class of workers and an emptiness and a desolation by night. However, hotels and apartment houses are likewise being built in place of the razed tenements, so that this section may eventually be parceled out on a sort of patchwork plan into business and residential sectors. That is a practical disposition of precious Manhattan ground space which seems to be growing in favor and which is illustrated in the residential development along the East River, the ones just below Hell Gate, at Sutton Place, and at Beekman Place, and by the preservation or restoration of respectable old home neighborhoods like Gramercy Park. This particular home neighborhood lies under the very walls of the citadel of trade in which silk is lord paramount. The advantage of this arrangement is that it does two things. It puts the brakes on the process of the depopulation of Manhattan. And it eliminates from the main arteries of the tidal flow streams of intra-urban workers who are enabled by this spotting about of living quarters to get out of the rush on common-carrier wheels. They may even do their commuting as 100 years ago John Jacob Astor did his—on foot.

Time was when it seemed that lower Manhattan was doomed to an unfair division between spacious offices and shops and cramped tenements for the poorer workers—a combination of the east side as it used to be and Wall Street and Fifth Avenue as they are now. For it appeared that the increase of the poorer folk who could not afford to commute would drive out utterly the resident who could afford to travel back and forth. This was the situation when the building of bridges and tubes across the East River and the placing of the outer spaces of the city only a nickel's worth away from the centre considerably changed the face of things by relieving the pressure on the lower east side where the density of population was greatest and the squalor equal to that anywhere.

WHAT happened was that the people from the east and south of Europe who made up the greater part of this population were ,as Walter Laidlaw puts it "subwayed into the outer spaces, not outer darkness, but spaces with light and air." It was from that time also that dense groups of population began to be formed in marginal regions on the very outer rim of the metropolis, dense groups, for example, like those of Williamsburg and Brownsville and sections of the Bronx.

The people of more or less recent foreign origin who formed these groups were gregarious from the circumstances of their previous life in the countries from which they came; the huddling habit was confirmed in them by the pressure of poverty which had packed them together on the lower east side. But this was only a contributing cause. The people who take care of real estate developments saw to it that every parcel of land, even if it stood surrounded by vacant parcels, should be as minutely subdivided into lots as possible. They still follow this practice—only in certain sorts of developments the possibilities of subdivision are more limited.

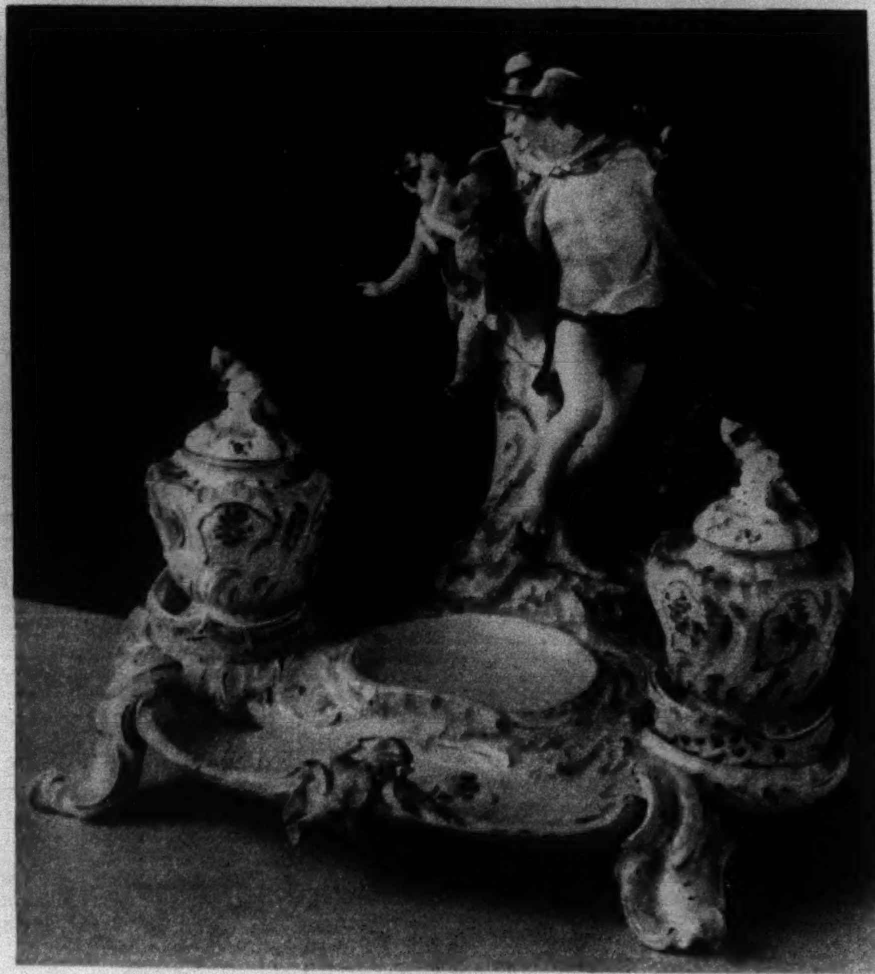
GERMANY STANDS BY OLD HANDICRAFTS

Porcelain and Metal Work Reflect Tradition and Modernism in Today's Home Furnishings



An Example of Early German Porcelain Made in 1763.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

BERLIN.

DESPITE the growing industrialization of most of the decorative arts that are factors in the furnishings of a home, one finds all over Germany the traditional handicrafts. Some crafts—such as the making of fine porcelain, pottery and glass—must long remain in the realm of the hand worker. Work in silver and in less precious metals also are, in the finest examples, handicrafts, although, as with us, the machine is an aid to large quantity production.

Since Germany was the birthplace of European porcelain, the process of making it having been discovered by Böttger at Meissen, near Dresden, about 1716, it is natural that the historical display of the wares from the State porcelain factory at the Old Berlin Exposition should have been noteworthy and interesting. The Old Berlin Exposition is one of those exhibitions which, combined with a garden and an open-air café, are an important part of the Summer life of the large cities of Germany. This one presented, in an almost endless series of large rooms, through the use of models and objects and documents of all kinds, a picture of the Berlin of the past and the men who helped make the city famous.

As with much of the past art and architecture of Berlin, the name of Frederick the Great is linked with the early manufacture of porcelain; for, in 1763, he founded the State porcelain works by purchase of a company created thirteen years earlier by the merchant Wedgely. At the Old Berlin Exposition were examples of the wonderful service made for Frederick's palace in 1770. On each of the many different pieces artists had depicted different types of flowers. The early work, following the fashion of the day, was in the fantastic rococco style, with figurine groups of cavaliers, ladies, musicians and shepherdesses, which are also to be seen in the porcelain from the works of Dresden and Munich. Gray and rose, black and gold, violet, yellow and gray-green and rose were characteristic colors of this early ware.

Today the output of the State porcelain factory at Berlin includes remarkably faithful reproductions of the best models of the past as well as of contemporary designs—some in the spirit of traditional art, with a few experiments in the modern mode. Some of the best artists of the day have been called upon for this work, as, for example, Ruth Schaumann, Wilhelm Lober and Richard Seewald. Miss Schaumann, whose whimsical art is also to be seen in illustrations for children's books, in sculpture and in drawings, has designed and decorated a series of dishes for a fish service, with delightful mermaids and playful fish in terra cotta ornamenting the white surface of the ware. One of her charming childish angels has also been reproduced in porcelain. Sculpturesque groups by Lober, in gray porcelain, are highly individualized; and Professor Paul Scheurich in his reclining female figures follows the classic tradition of the eighteenth century. In the old style of pictorial ornamentation Professor Richard Seewald has developed a service on which the adventures of Robinson Crusoe are depicted.

One of the most recent developments at the State porcelain factory is the use of porcelain in necklaces. Color and gold and platinum are baked on the bisque ground with all the care given an expensive piece of porcelain. Another development is the use as vases of the simple, white cups and jars originally made for the chemical industry, householders employing them as table ware and as flower holders, tea caddies and ash trays.

For the person wishing to be very smart and modern, the latest tea and coffee sets in porcelain discard the colorful ornamentation of the past and present cups and saucers and covered dishes in the purest white—relying on the charm of form for their attractiveness. This fashion is not extensive, as most persons prefer the beauty of color and the ornamentation of the artist's brush. Still, it indicates the tendency toward simplicity which is also seen in the figurines created by artists today, the long lines of drapery being emphasized instead of the minute folds and delicate laces of the traditional German porcelain of the past.

AS with the porcelain, the decorative glass of Germany is distinguished by the importance of the artists who are called on to design the forms and apply the engraved decoration. Several centres have become known recently for their products, including towns where the arts and crafts schools—such as at Stuttgart and Zwiesel—are important centres of inspiration and production.

Conspicuous among the designers and makers of fine glass is Professor Wilhelm von Eiff of Stuttgart. His engraved platters, bowls and vases show ornamentation in both high and low relief. He is said to be alone in Germany in his ability to do both. His intaglio and cameo cuttings on glass are also noteworthy. Professor von Eiff is the director of the glass department at the arts and crafts school in Stuttgart, from which have come some of the leading men and women glass workers.

Illustrative of the constant search for technical improvement by such leaders in the crafts is the development by Professor von Eiff of a special kind of glass for church and other formal windows. In this new method, which is a combination of glass making, painting and engraving, some interesting examples have been recently executed by his students. By various technical processes the required figure design is executed in color on large sheets of opaque glass.

The Zwiesel glass comes from an old glass town which has in recent years become one of the important centres for glass in Germany. From Zwiesel comes the work of Professor Bruno Mauder, whose straight-line, sketch-like figure ornaments of vases and plates in red or gold are charmingly graceful. From this town also comes the work of Anton Pech, who, like Professor Mauder, is connected with the local arts and crafts school. His ornamentation, often figures of dancing girls, always carries a gay air along with its high technical excellence.

VERY important among the crafts in which the hand is still largely a significant factor is the work of the German silversmith and metal worker. Although the machine is employed to a limited extent, the niceties of form in silver, tea and coffee sets and plates and vases and flagons must still be developed by the eye and hand. In the work of Professor P. Haüstein of Stuttgart one sees the elaborate enrichment of tradition—a vase, for example, is of silver inlaid with copper and gold and set with semi-precious stones. A silver tea set, while partaking in its shape of contemporary design, has much of elaborate ornamentation in the rich

WHEN EDISON AND FORD WERE SEVENTEEN

At the Age of His Latest Protégé, the Inventor Was Jobless and the Motor Car Wizard Made $4.50 a Week

Henry Ford—the Boy.

Thomas A. Edison—the Boy.

By JAMES C. YOUNG

THOMAS A. EDISON'S second attempt to select a youthful genius, supported by the judgment of Henry Ford, inevitably leads to speculation upon the outlook of these famous men at the age of 17. That is the budding period, in the view of the inventor, for the genius he is trying to find annually. Last year it was a boy from the far West and this year a boy from the old East.

Both of them have had opportunities for early instruction that Edison and Ford conspicuously lacked. Each has been reared with a measure of protection and guidance unknown to the inventor or the master of industry. In their turn they have shown a mental facility and qualities of character that meet Mr. Edison's conceptions. While they continue their studies under his auspices, it becomes interesting to examine the unguided youth of Edison and Ford. Can genius be developed, or does it spring forth of itself?

They were produced by the same environment, boys of the Middle West before it became the workshop of America. The generation of their fathers had developed to some degree what the pioneers hewed from the wilderness. Both were born in plain, pineboard homes on the edge of the clearing. Their lives have proved that "no cot is safe from genius." Although the youth of neither man is so far remote, the America of that day has vanished. When little Tom and young Henry were running about the farms of Michigan the possibilities of modern life did not exist.

Those were the days of the slow-moving America, almost the ox-cart days. The machine had not been summoned to the aid of man. Labor was endless. Education meant a few years in a country school. A young man starting life might find a place behind the counter of the village store or he might stay on the farm. Some young men went to work for the new and growing railroads. But the vast latter day, in which any youngster may choose a career unhampered, was yet to emerge from the mystery of the future.

Perhaps the first impression of Thomas A. Edison was a reflection of the life ahead, of the new day beyond the horizon. He was born in Milan, Ohio, on Feb. 11, 1847, and still recalls the hours spent upon his father's doorstep, watching the wagon trains of settlers bound for California and gold. What an impression to lodge in the mind of such a boy!

This town of Milan chanced to be in the midst of spreading wheat fields. But the railroad was yet to come and a system of canals opening the way to Eastern markets embodied the hope of the country. Milan was the proud port of a new canal and a lumber centre. Before he was 6 Edison had learned the lumbermen's songs and cut his fingers with their tools.

Then, in 1854, the elder Edison—Samuel—moved to Port Huron, Mich., not many miles from the spot where Henry Ford would be born sixteen years later. Young Edison was yet to enter school. His health had been delicate and it was feared that he might be a little strange, a precocious youngster, who asked interminable questions and had a genius for getting into trouble.

There was the matter of his learning to read. Both his mother—who had been a school teacher—and his father agreed that it would be as well to put off that day, on account of the boy's nervousness. But young Tom learned from neighbor youngsters about the alphabet and borrowed a slate. He was found, a few days later, copying the merchants' signs in the town square.

There was nothing to do but let him go to school, against his mother's doubts. Accordingly, in the Fall, he was entered in the Port Huron school. Tom's mother had taught him something at home, but he was older than the boys of his class, a little out of place. Despite the mental activity that worried her, he failed to get on in his lessons. Finally his teacher pronounced him "addled."

That remark was rather too much for the boy's mother. She took him from school after a brief six months, never to re-enter him in another seat of learning. Then his real instruction began, advancing from the simple arts of reading and writing with a swiftness amazing to her. They read Hume's "History of England" and Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," the "Principia" of Newton and many another book in the Winter evenings.

SAM EDISON sat by the fire, dozing perhaps, but taking estimate of this strange son of his—the boy with the abnormal skull and the impetuous will. He was forever asking questions, not a few of which furrowed the paternal brow. Particularly, the boy wanted to know the causes and processes of nature, of mechanics, of phenomena about which his father knew nothing. Every word in the evening reading seemed to prompt questions. No wonder that Sam Edison went off to bed shaking his head.

It has been said that the man always can be seen in the boy. True or untrue, young Tom had a bent toward mechanics, chemistry and the allied mysteries. One of his first experiments—at least, one of the first recorded—concerned the problem of human flight. He decided that it was no more than a matter of supplying power to lift the necessary weight. Plainly that could be done by the force of gases. And what simpler method than to induce a neighbor boy—Michael Oates—to swallow sufficient Seidlitz powders? Michael might be expected to ascend in a hurry. But the result cost young Tom a friend and more than a fair reprimand from his mother. Reprimands, in those days, were delivered across the knee.

Port Huron was just sixty-three miles from Detroit. That meant an all-day run on the new Grand Trunk Railroad. Between 12 and 13 Edison hit upon the idea of offering yesterday's newspapers and current magazines to passengers, as a method to while away the ride. It would scarcely be possible today, but Edison approached the railroad and negotiated a franchise in his own right. Before long the road put on an express train between the two points and Edison employed another boy for the local, becoming an employer of labor.

Now, it was aboard the express that the boy's genius really did bud, some time before the period of 17 Mr. Edison has chosen for his later experiments. He installed a press in one section of the baggage car and there wrote, edited, set up and printed The Weekly Herald, "the first newspaper ever printed on a train" and perhaps the only one. It cost three cents a week or eight cents a month, and subscribers multiplied.

This was the beginning of the prodigious years. Edison's father had undertaken a truck garden in Port Huron, but it yielded indifferently. The boy saw that vegetables in Detroit were fresher and better than those at home. He began to do a thriving trade along the lines in these commodities, sometimes taking his pay in butter and eggs, to be sold for a further profit. Nor was this all. He installed a laboratory in that unused section of the baggage car and there engaged in the analysis of intricate problems best known to himself.

The baggage master had his rightful suspicions of such a boy. And the day that a stick of phosphorus tumbled from the shelf to the floor it brought Edison's railroad career to a dramatic close. The wooden floor of the car caught fire. Another moment and smoke filled the car. Another and there was the baggage master with a pail of water. He not only put out the fire but administered a box on the ear of young Tom that later made him permanently deaf—one of the famous blows of history. At the next station, inventor, laboratory and printing press were deposited upon the platform for such destiny as the fates might choose.

There was a gap in the life of the boy that offered no little room for reflection. His father would be likely to make pointed comment upon his foolishness, and his mother would look at him reproachfully. Just before Christmas he was down at the station in a near-by town, waiting to see the train go by—since trains were his delight—when a child ran upon the tracks. One spring, a quick grab, and Edison had saved the child's life.

Here the fates did seem to take a hand. The father proved to be the station master. In his praise he offered to "do anything he could" for Edison. There and then the hero of the hour asked the station master to teach him telegraphy. From that accident the railroad dispatchers gained one of their famous men.

In a little while he was the station night operator at Stratford Junction in Canada. There he turned avidly to a new series of experiments and a cycle of reading. He was away from home for the first time, against his mother's desire. Premature deafness had begun, but it did not prevent him from hearing the key. There were only a few trains during his hours of duty and Edison decided that he might as well sleep between trains.

HIS inventive quality showed itself by the introduction of an alarm clock set for the hours that trains would pass. But some one reported this ruse to the chief operator. Edison was ordered to report every half hour. Then he hooked up the clock and the telegraph key to send the signal automatically. An excellent device, until the night that headquarters called him fifteen minutes without answer. The chief operator ordered a man to the station from the nearest point by handcar. And he found Edison asleep!

At 17 the boy who would contribute more than any other man to the world's wealth, and who would become the foremost scientist of his time, was out of a job and without anything resembling a good character. In asking for his next job he could not refer to the last one. Every one who knew him at home would have said that he was a strange youngster, not to be relied upon. He was one of those boys "who read too much," filling his head with things that no normal boy should be allowed to know. He was the "grief of his parents," or so the neighbors thought in Port Huron, on the day that he definitely turned his back upon home to begin a wandering telegrapher's life.

A TINY ISLE OF HARDSHIP

By HAYDEN CHURCH

LONDON.

"MISERY ISLAND." So the Scottish fishermen call lonely St. Kilda, the pinnacle of inhabited rock all but lost in the wash of the North Atlantic, whose tiny population, one of the smallest and loneliest in the world, is anxious to turn its back on it forever.

The most isolated of the bleak and wind-swept Outer Hebrides, and lying about a hundred miles west of the northern coast of Scotland, St. Kilda is entirely cut off from the outside world for practically nine months in the year. Life is miserable there, and it is because their lot has been steadily growing harder that the islanders recently petitioned the British Government to be transferred to the mainland. The petition has been granted and the evacuation of the people and their sheep will probably take place in September.

There are now only thirty-six of the islanders left—not counting a nurse, a missionary and the latter's family—and they evidently are utterly weary of their terrible isolation and of the hardships, sometimes approaching actual starvation, which it entails.

Only about seven miles in circumference and with precipitous cliffs that rise sheer to a height of more than 1,000 feet, St. Kilda receives few visitors. From the beginning of June to the end of August in most years a steamer from the Scottish port of Greenock makes regular trips to the island with provisions. If it is a fine Summer, tourists come to St. Kilda. But sometimes, even in these months, only a few trips to the island have been possible, and it often has happened, owing to stormy weather, that the supply steamer has had to leave before the whole of the stores for the islanders could be carried ashore.

THROUGHOUT the Winter trawlers establish the only contact with the outside world, but last Winter exceptionally fierce gales kept even these from visiting the island for long intervals. From the middle of January to the middle of April, in fact, the St. Kildans were entirely cut off from the mainland and suffered severely.

One skipper who had set out for St. Kilda with provisions at a time when its inhabitants were beginning to be short of food was unable to locate the island for more than a week, owing to fog. It is rare for the islanders to get their Christmas mail before the middle of February.

They grow potatoes, but the crop often fails, and their main fare consists of scones, a Scottish kind of bread not unlike American biscuits. Accordingly, when their stock of flour and bicarbonate of soda—the two main ingredients for scone making—dwindles to almost nothing, they face privation.

At such times the islanders go out in the only boat they possess, an old lifeboat, and try to hail any trawler that may be in sight. Sometimes they succeed in attracting attention, but not always. The isolation has been increased these last months by the break-down of the island's wireless installation. As early as September, last year, a letter from the missionary's wife, which a fishing boat brought to Fleetwood, Scotland, declared that unless stores were sent "we must perish." Luckily, by that time, stores were on the way.

Only the other day a steam trawler on arriving at Fleetwood reported that it had abandoned its fishing voyage during rough weather on the high seas in order to bring help to a 23-year-old girl of St. Kilda who was dying. The trawler was steaming past the island when waving sheets were observed ashore and the vessel drew in. Islanders rowed out to it and asked that a message from the island's nurse, Miss Barclay, should be put on the trawler's wireless at once. The message was addressed to the Scottish Board of Health at Edinburgh, and stated that Mary Gillies was seriously ill, and asked for medical advice.

An immediate reply came from the board, which asked if the trawler could put into Leverburgh, South Uist, one of the larger Hebrides, and await the arrival of a doctor. This was done and the vessel picked up a physician.

Then began the dash of fifty miles back to St. Kilda, where the trawler arrived the same night, but the gale had increased so much that it was impossible to approach until 10 the next morning. Unfortunately the girl's condition was hopeless and she could not be moved to a hospital on the mainland. She died a few days later.

"A sort of sea-bird race of humans." Thus somebody described the St. Kildans, members of one of the most curious communities on earth. As might be expected, they are a primitive group, who fled in a body when the first movie film they had ever seen showed them a locomotive rushing out upon them. They share among them five family names—those of McKinnon, Macdonald, McQueen, Gillies and Ferguson.

Some of the finest fishing grounds lie around the island, and the St. Kildans catch fish and also breed sheep on the five-miles-distant island of Boreray. But every year the population has diminished slightly, and it became evident some time ago that the island would eventually be abandoned to the innumerable sea birds. For the older generation has been dying out and the young people prefer the gayeties of Glasgow and Edinburgh.

Yet the men of St. Kilda are active and erect in bearing. Their voices are tuneful and resonant—for they have to carry above the roar of the surf—and their sight is so keen that they can usually be certain of the identity of a person a great distance away. More than any other dwellers in the isles, they are pitted against the forces of nature. The fowler on the great precipices of 1,000 feet, as he hangs over the abyss, the crew as they sail their small craft over mountainous seas, the fisherman as he stands precariously upon some slippery edge of rock—all these on St. Kilda face ever-present peril.

VISITORS SHOW NEW YORK THE GRAND MANNER

one night. The average length of a convention is four and a half days, and visitors have to step lively.

New York, the guide books say, offers a great many attractions at low cost. There are many cultural advantages, there are a number of fine museums and so forth. But; sad to relate, the people who come from outside cities and towns do not give them the attention they may deserve, if the experience of convention managers is a guide. Parties scheduled to take in New York's cultural facilities are invariably a failure. Tea, followed by a trip through the Metropolitan Museum, brings no great traffic rush.

TWENTY-SIX MILES for a nickel—thus far can one ride for one fare in the subway. But few among New York's visitors ever ride the twenty-six miles and get their full nickel's worth. Although most of them want to see the subway, one short ride in it—especially in Summer—is generally enough.

A magnificent view may be obtained of New York's harbor for 10 cents, by way of the municipal ferry to Staten Island and return, yet relatively few visitors are interested. The Aquarium attracts only a limited number from out-of-town, say authorities, but numerous visitors cross the bay to see the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island. The Woolworth Tower is always popular, taking in an average of $800 daily from 1,600 sightseers. In years gone by the Morgue was a favorite stopping place for morbidly inclined out-of-towners, but recent soft-pedaling publicity of its attractions has resulted in the substitution of more cheerful things.

New York has a side which appeals to Cousin Jim's wife, but interests Cousin Jim negatively, in his pocketbook. Because of the city's rise as the style centre of the country, and its pre-eminence in the production of women's apparel, mother and wife and sister delight to come here and buy clothes with New York labels.

Tours arranged for the wives of convention visitors offer attractions of which the resident New Yorker is often unaware. There are behind-the scenes views of big stores, of cash-tube rooms pouring in millions daily, of small factories with clever craftsmanship. Inside the large hotels are views of ideal housekeeping on a huge scale which bring wonder to the eyes of women from small towns. In one hotel here, the laundry handles each day 26,000 pieces for the establishment and 40,000 for the guests. There are repair shops in these hostelries for the replenishment of furniture and other articles; nicked glasses are ground down to a smooth edge by machinery; and table cutlery is replated in hotel factories.

Buyers form a large part of the army which visits New York. Before the World War, there were two seasons—February and August—in which the buyers descended upon the city to lay in stock for the next six months. The war started a hand-to-mouth policy of merchandising, necessitating more visits here, and now some buyers come to the metropolis as often as twenty-four times a year. To balance this, however, many large stores throughout the country maintain a staff of resident buyers in New York, one being said to have 400 here all the time.

It has been charged that New York is inhospitable toward its visitors, that the residents make no effort to entertain outsiders. This indictment is generally admitted to be true, but it is blamed on the pace of business and social life here, and the lack of time for other things. It is also pointed out that New York, as a matter of business, has more persons whose chief duty it is to entertain visitors than any other city in the country. Every large bank has its service department, and when out-of-town clients or correspondents arrive they are carefully taken care of in every respect all of the time. "Distinguished visitors," of course, are received in a manner all too well known. Soldiers who passed through New York in war time still have a kindly word for its hospitality.

EVERY Summer brings an army of 40,000 students to New York. They come largely for book-learning, but are determined that nothing in the way of sightseeing shall escape them. They often get to know the city better than New Yorkers do.

Ammunition for advertising New York as a Summer resort is not lacking. The city is near the sea. The Weather Bureau reports—believe it or not—that the sun is out here 61 per cent of all daytime hours, and that this record is surpassed by only two other cities in the United States, Miami with 68 per cent and Los Angeles with 67. It is feared, however, that it will take more than statistics to change some visitors' opinion of the city as a place in which to live. "Yes, it's a nice place to visit once in a while, but live there? I wouldn't live in New York if you gave me the place! ! !"

DEPOTS FOR REPAIRS

ALTHOUGH New York is well supplied with hospitals for men, women and children, it is even more plentifully equipped with hospitals devoted to objects and animals not belonging to the human race. When a dog is sick, when a fountain pen does not function or a Chinese vase is cracked, there is always a place to which it can be taken to be made healthy and whole. There are few things in the animal, vegetable or mineral kingdom which, if placed in the situation of Humpty-Dumpty, cannot be put together again.

In some corner of most large department stores—usually located near the toy department—is a little repair shop which is nearly always busy. A man whose knowledge of many things is nothing short of astonishing is in charge. To him are brought the kiddie cars that have lost a bolt, the sailboats whose keels are bent, the doll whose head is in danger of falling off. A little digging around for spare parts, a little expert craftsmanship, and a child is happy again.

Damage and breakage are common in the big hotels, but the "hospitals" of these establishments are ready to cope with almost any amount. Furniture is mended to be as good as new; nicked glasses and china are ground down until the edges are smooth as ever. A force of painters and interior decorators are ready to attend to the damage to walls and doors.

LITTLE hospitals abound in out-of-the-way streets. One may be devoted to pipes, their sale and repair. A man breaks the stem off an old and seasoned favorite, unless it be repaired his heart also feels the strain. But at the little pipe shop a new stem can be obtained. In the same way other articles dear to their owners, such as violins or other musical instruments, can be mended in little shops by the hand of a master.

Perhaps the finest patching of broken bodies—bodies without life—is done in the little bric-a-brac repair shops. There are only a few of these in the city. Here are brought relics dug from loft and cellar—glassware, silver candlesticks, old English porcelain—in a sad shape of disrepair. The tiny fragments of the china are glued together with infinite patience, the gaps are filled in with cement, and paint is applied to fit the pattern of decoration. When the job is completed the scars are healed and to all appearances the article is as good as new. Some of the work is done in the shop itself, while part of it is farmed out to individual workmen living in other sections of the city. The artisans who take care of this delicate plastic surgery were perhaps formerly skilled workers in the Old World, and impart their knowledge to this newer trade.

Dogs, monkeys, cats and birds, when sick, all have hospitals to which they can be taken and kept until cured. Many of these institutions are scattered throughout the city, others are located in the suburbs, where patients can have the country air while convalescing. In addition, there is a free animal clinic maintained by the Humane Society of New York. To this clinic one afternoon a week come cats whose nails need to be cut, horses whose teeth must be filed, dogs with eye-trouble, even goats with indigestion. All are given veterinary service and sent on their way.

Even suits of clothes have their hospitals. When the trousers of a suit are so badly torn or worn as to be useless, while the coat is in good shape, there is no need to throw away the outfit. A stroll up a main thoroughfare will usually find a sandwich man, a man on stilts or a man dressed in a crazy-patchwork quilt suit, advertising a tailor who professes to be able to match any coat or trousers.

AN EMPEROR IN A CENTURY'S RETROSPECT

Francis Joseph's Long Life Viewed in the Light of the Fall of His House and the End of His Empire

By CLAIR PRICE

TOMORROW is the centenary of the Emperor Francis Joseph's birth, and a memorial tablet is to be unveiled in the Votive Church in Vienna, the slender Gothic structure which was raised to commemorate his escape from assassination in 1853. It is the first occasion on which Vienna and Europe have had both the leisure and the clear-mindedness to review a reign which bulks so large in their common history. It is an occasion which has been worth awaiting, for events which occurred after his death have given him an even greater meaning than the hundreds of carefully prepared and never published obituaries of 1916 gave him.

It was not known in 1916 that the Empéror Charles, who succeeded him, was to abdicate in 1918 and that Austria-Hungary was then to disappear from the ranks of the great powers, its lands to be divided up among seven national States. It is known now that the brief reign of the Emperor Charles was a mere postlude, that in reality the empire of the Hapsburgs died with the old Emperor in 1916, and that the fall of that empire was in a political sense the most important event in Europe since the fall of Rome's Western empire fifteen centuries ago.

Tomorrow's program in Vienna will not be a monarchist demonstration, for the republic has turned its back on the Hapsburgs and has taught its citizens, outwardly at least, to do the same. Does the Soviet mourn the Czars? Do the Turks mourn the Sultans? No more does the Republic of Austria mourn the Hapsburgs. What has happened had to happen. It was a necessary part of that revolution which first broke upon Europe when the Paris mob stormed the Bastile on July 14, 1789.

Hungary excepted, the ten nations of the old empire have settled their accounts with the Hapsburgs in full. A whole generation died for the Hapsburgs during the war and no Hapsburg monarchism now remains anywhere in the old empire, Hungary always excepted. The Republic of Austria has thrown open the great Hapsburg palaces to its own citizens and has preserved for its own and the world's enrichment every item of the incalculable Hapsburg treasures which the peace treaties left to it. Most of the surviving Hapsburgs have left for more congenial climates, Spain for example, and the impoverished few who remain in the republic are tolerated as long as they remain good republicans. If tomorrow's program has the effect of clothing the old Emperor in colors of rose, it will only be because Vienna has served six centuries of Hapsburgs and the melancholy of an old and departed glory will seek such passing expression as it can find.

Vienna remembers him best as he was toward the end, a man of many sorrows who had outgrown the personal hostility of his subjects, who had perhaps outgrown even their love, who had become so old and so remote as to be an object of reverence rather than of active affection. In his own way he always sought to promote the welfare of his subjects and there are thousands of Viennese who remember having seen him at some outdoor fête, which was being honored by the Imperial and Royal Presence, a thin, erect figure with massive dark eyebrows and clipped light-gray side-whiskers, always in uniform, always with the courtesy, the dignity and the reserve of his exalted position, standing by himself on his bit of red carpet, bowing, smiling and murmuring his stereotyped expression of thanks before taking his leave: "Es war sehr schön. Es hat mich sehr gefreut." (It was very beautiful. I have enjoyed it very much.)

The Aged Emperor—A Man of Sorrows.

He was the head of a family which had taken up the fight against the French Revolution at the point where the Bourbons of France had succumbed. In that fight against democracy and nationalism his reign began and in that fight it ended. The world changed out of all recognition during his time. Never in all history has there been another such deluge of change. Yet he himself never changed, unless in his later years his deadly seriousness, his instinctive distrust of ability, his suspicion of anything new, became mellowed by a certain hopeless cynicism. Railroads, motors, airplanes, telegraphs, telephones, typewriters, wireless, all came during his lifetime. Yet he never saw a typewriter, he never tolerated a telephone, and the only occasion on which he was ever known to have used a motor was when King Edward VII was his guest at Ischl.

Modern industry and international finance arose during his reign, uprooting primitive populations from the soil and driving them into the labor markets of the rising factory towns, sharpening the struggle for existence, creating new antagonisms and new political creeds, pouring new wealth into his expanding capital, giving it a new spirit, a new magnificence, a more lavish development of the arts, making it the loveliest capital in Europe. Yet, within the pomp and ceremony of the Hapsburg court, he continued to lead a life of monastic simplicity, the perfect practitioner of the art of reigning, applying his unparalleled experience to the preservation of the ancient rights of his dynasty, seeking only to hand down unimpaired to his heir the great family domain which had been handed down to him.

His realm lay in that central part of Europe in which Germans, Magyars and Slavs meet. Their common linguistic frontier in fact, is not far from Vienna itself. His populations formed an unprecedented confusion of races—21,000,000 Slavs (Czechs, Croats, Poles, Serbs, Slovenes, Slovaks, Ruthenians), 12,000,000 Germans, 9,000,000 Magyars, 4,000,000 Latins (Italians and Rumanians). They inhabited a realm which the Babenberg and Hapsburg dynasties had expanded during the last ten centuries from an original nucleus which served as medieval Europe's Eastern frontier.

This idea of an Eastern frontier was for centuries the justification of the realm and no other name than its original name of Ostmark has ever adequately described it. But Ostmark or Oesterreich or, in English, Austria, was a name applicable only to its original part. Austria-Hungary, its modern name, was applicable in the strict sense only to its original part and the Magyar country. The name of Hapsburg was the only name associated with it which was applicable to all its parts, and indeed, once Europe ceased to require an Eastern bulwark in the valley of the Danube, the last of the great family domains became an artificial organism held together only by the Hapsburgs.

TOWARD the end its only unity was in the person of the Emperor and Europe's prophets weer murmuring ominously, "When Francis Joseph dies—." The old Emperor was so averse to the limelight that very few anecdotes were ever told of him, but his years, his courtliness, his Spartan devotion to duty, perhaps also the personal tragedies which hounded him, commanded the agreement of his polyglot populations in one matter at least. There was little personal sorrow that was spared him. The Empress was assassinated at Geneva. The Crown Prince, his only son, shot himself after shooting his mistress. His brother, Maximilian, was shot in Mexico, leaving a widow hopelessly insane. His sister-in-law was burned to death in Paris. His cousin, Ludwig of Bavaria, went insane and killed himself. His nephew and heir was assassinated at Sarajevo. But the greatest tragedy of all lay in the fact that the decay of the Ottoman Empire had deprived his realm of its original function in the European scheme and he was incapable of creating some new function for it.

GENERAL MACARTHUR RISES TO THE TOP

Honor Man at West Point Only Twenty-seven Years Ago, He Is Called to Head the Army as Its Chief of Staff

By F. L. MINNIGERODE

IN the Summer of 1903 the first name called at the graduation exercises at West Point was that of Cadet Douglas MacArthur. He had stood first in his class of more than 100 cadets and thus became the "honor man" of the year. He was commissioned a Second Lieutenant of Engineers, the corps usually selected by the first ten men because it meant, at that time, more rapid promotion.

Standing at the head of his class was not necessarily taken by either the army or the corps of cadets as an omen that his future career in the service would be strewn with honors. Many a man has stood first in his class at the Military Academy only to peter out in the service. It is almost an entirely different game, and scholarly attainments and aptitude for absorbing the grind of West Point do not guarantee that the man will be a good officer or that battles, sieges, fortunes are going to be the diet he will thrive upon.

But this has not been the case with the man who has just been named as the next Chief of Staff to succeed General Summerall in November. Douglas MacArthur has stepped blithely up the army ladder of fame until he is now about to perch upon the topmost rung. To be a full General in the United States Army at any age is a distinction—we have had precious few of them in our history—but to have achieved a rank never held by Washington or any other Revolutionary hero, and only by Grant, Sherman and Sheridan of Civil War fame, at the age of 50 is something that has never happened in time of peace before.

Douglas MacArthur is good to look upon. He has all the élan and verve that one looks for in a soldier. You would pick him for a military man whether you saw him in a bathing suit or in a fur coat. He has it earmarked all over him, and he ought to have, for he was to the service born, his father having been a distinguished officer a generation ago and having attained before his retirement the then highest grade of Lieutenant General.

HE is popular. He is tactful, which was amply proved during his tenure of office at the War Department in the early days of the war when his duty was to meet the newspaper men and pass out all the news the department thought should be printed and to answer such questions as he thought should be answered. When the newspaper men unanimously acclaimed him, upon his relinquishment of this duty to go to France, he was definitely convicted of possessing an abundance of tact and personality.

Douglas MacArthur is not an easy man to gauge. He has temperament and a store of innate ability. He has been tested in many capacities, and while at times he has not been entirely free from adverse criticism, he has most certainly come through his more than thirty years of service with banners flying.

General MacArthur has a faculty for doing the unexpected and he has the personality to get away with it whether the unexpected has always been the wise thing to do or not. A case in point: The Chief of Staff of a division of some 25,000 men is a most important and responsible post, a job calling for untiring and unremitting vigilance. This is especially true if the command happens to be in the front line, with a watchful and clever enemy opposite. A thousand things can happen; exigencies might arise in the twinkling of an eye that would call for action by the division's Chief of Staff. Yet Douglas MacArthur could discount all possible contingencies and accompany a patrol into "No Man's Land" to "let the boys know somebody at headquarters was willing to go with them." Most division staff officers were a long way back, heads bent over maps or reports, gauging the ebb and flow of battle. But Douglas MacArthur spent much of his time at the front, rallying broken units and cheering the men on their way.

That his method was a praiseworthy departure from the accepted one of winning battles from a dugout is attested by the citations accompanying the award of the Distinguished Service Cross and the Oak Leaf Cluster, as well as by the letter written to General Pershing by MacArthur's Division Commander.

In spite of the fact that a high-ranking staff officer, by all the rules of the game, ought not to be throwing hand grenades across the wire entanglements, MacArthur's immediate superiors found nothing to censure and much to praise in his conduct.

Two citations accompanied the award of the Distinguished Service Cross and the Oak Leaf Cluster, the equivalent of a second award, for "extraordinary heroism against an armed enemy." The first when MacArthur was Colonel and Chief of Staff of the famous "Rainbow" or Forty-second Division read:

"When Company D, 168th Infantry, was under severe attack in the salient du Feys, France, he voluntarily joined it, upon finding that he could do so without interfering with his normal duties, and by his coolness and conspicuous courage added materially to its success."

Then for the Oak Leaf Cluster, we read:

"An Oak Leaf Cluster is awarded General MacArthur for the following acts of distinguished service: As Brigade Commander General MacArthur personally led his men and by the skillful manoeuvring of his brigade made possible the capture of Hills 288, 242 and the Côte-de-Chatillon, France, Oct. 14, 15 and 16, 1918. He displayed indomitable resolution and great courage in rallying broken lines and in re-forming attacks, thereby making victory possible. On a field where courage was the rule, his courage was the dominant feature."

On top of this we find his immediate commander, General Charles T. Menoher of the "Rainbow" Division, writing to General Pershing as follows:

"* * * the contributions made to our military establishment by this general officer [MacArthur] have already had far-reaching effects. He has stood for the actual physical command of large bodies of troops in battle, not for a day but for days' duration, and I believe has actually commanded larger bodies of troops in battle line than any other officer in our army, with, in each instance, conspicuous success."

In selecting the youngest Major General in the army for the most important, highest-ranking post—General MacArthur will wear the four silver stars of a full General during his four years as Chief of Staff—President Hoover has, naturally, given many older and able officers heartaches and stirred up some controversy. There were a number of distinguished Major Generals with more experience in executive positions and perhaps a wider experience in war—provided we consider it in the light of service against many enemies. General MacArthur's wartime experience, on account of his youth, has been limited almost entirely to his service in France during the World War. There are older officers, but still young enough to serve a full four years before reaching the retirement age, who have seen service in many fields—the Spanish War, the Philippine Insurrection, the Boxer outbreak in China, as well as the World War. Some of these men are soldiers of recognized and conspicuous ability and it must have given them a distinct feeling of chagrin to see the door to the highest post in the army closed in their faces.

The army as a whole recognizes the great ability and respects whole-heartedly the selection of Douglas MacArthur. He has moved forward from post to post, from honor to honor, with a greater rapidity than even his most ardent supporters could have hoped for. He has been in succession the "honor man" of his class at West Point, aide to President Roosevelt, the youngest Brigadier, the youngest officer ever to be Superintendent of the Military Academy, the youngest Major General, and now the youngest man ever to hold the highest post of Chief of Staff. It is, indeed, a splendid record and a high tribute to his ability.

And he has ability. He has shown it in all of his past assignments, an ability of an outstanding sort. If any criticism has been leveled at him, it was mostly because of his attitude toward the old established and traditional discipline of West Point. As Superintendent of West Point he worked for a broader liberalization of the Corps of Cadets, believed that added liberty gave added responsibilities. "West Point," he once said, "represents the apotheosis of the public school system, and in its development there should be that spirit of generous foresight that has marked the educational systems of the nation for the past century." In one of his reports he said that to reach the end sought there had been at West Point under his superintendency a "substitution of subjective for objective discipline, a progressive increase of cadet responsibility tending to develop initiative and force of character rather than automatic performance of stereotyped functions."

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR has had two experiences that, so far as can be recalled, no other general officer of our present day army has ever had. He was captured! But not by the enemy. When every American knew that the German Army was on the run and the Meuse-Argonne operations had broken down the enemy resistance, the American First Division and the "Rainbow" Division were having something of a foot race to be the first allied troops to enter Sedan, where the French were so chagrined in 1870. A patrol of the rival division—First—ran into MacArthur in the plutonian darkness and in spite of his protests made him "prisoner." They said he looked like a boche.

Then, two years ago, he was selected as president of the American Olympic Committee and took charge of the American athletes that competed in the Olympic games at Amsterdam in 1928. In this almost exclusively executive position his personality made him very nearly, as one of the athletes expressed it, "one of the boys." Douglas MacArthur would rather be a sportsman in defeat than a boastful man in victory. His report to President Coolidge on the results of the Olympic games gives an insight into this phase of his character. He wrote:

"Of equal importance with the actual competitive success (America led the nations with 131 points to 62 for Finland, which came second), it is a matter of pride to report that the American team worthily represented the best traditions of American sportsmanship and chivalry. Imperturbable in defeat, modest in victory, its conduct typified fair play, courtesy and courage."

An incident of the Olympic games is recalled. When the first boxing bout was decided against the American who, according to all rules of the game was a clear winner over his South African opponent, the manager of the United States boxing team was so infuriated that he withdrew the team from further competition. General MacArthur stepped in at this point and ordered the team back into competition with the comment: "Americans never quit!" There is little doubt that Douglas MacArthur has the gift for sizing up a tactical situation and applying the proper psychology

MANCHURIA, A RICH PRIZE, GROWS RICHER

Going Its Own Way, It May Hold the Golden Key to China's Regeneration

A Great Tide of People Flows From Troubled China to Rich Manchuria.

By HERBERT ADAMS GIBBONS

MUKDEN.

THE strenuous efforts of the Nanking and Peking factions to persuade Chang Hsueh-liang, the youthful war lord who reigns supreme here, to intervene in the Chinese civil war indicate both the complete autonomy of Manchuria and the vital importance of this region's armed forces if brought into play. But Manchuria is occupied with her own affairs. One has to come here and travel through the country to realize that the self-absorption is natural. China has done nothing for Manchuria: Manchuria can do something for China only if she learns how to keep in her own hands and use to advantage the political power that could be enjoyed by those who administer provinces of astoundingly increasing wealth and population.

Manchuria is the land of miracles. It is hard for the traveler to believe his own eyes. No region in the world affords more fascinating material for the study of human progress and of conflicting national interests and ambitions. The old adage "Happy is the country that has no history" is contradicted by Manchuria's experience. Bones of contention are generally picked dry. Here is one that thrives from being fought over. "Thrives" is a mild word! Manchuria is being transformed rapidly into one of the world's richest lands.

Thirty-five years ago, when Japan drove China out of Korea and, with her armies invading Manchuria, compelled China to sue for peace, there were comparatively few Chinese in the country. The Manchus had not allowed them to settle in large numbers in this region, although it had been depopulated by the strain of providing the Manchu banner garrisons in China for two and a half centuries. By the treaty Japan obtained the cession of the tip of the Liaotung Peninsula, at the southern end of Manchuria, where only a few fishermen lived. Russia, with the support of France and Germany, forced Japan to renounce this treaty provision, on the ground that it infringed upon the sovereignty and integrity of China. But immediately afterward, tempted to extend her own control over Manchuria as a result of the completion of the Transsiberian Railway, Russia got from China the privileges denied to Japan. A branch of the Russian line was pushed southward. Russia constructed a commercial port at Dalny and fortified Port Arthur as a naval base.

This was the beginning of a three-cornered struggle, full of surprises, that has continued through three decades. Scene after scene has been enacted in the colorful and swiftly moving drama. Some were diplomatic, others military and still others economic; all have been stirring, and occasionally the dénouement of a scene has been startling. The curtain has not yet rung down on this drama. The giants of the East—China, Japan and Russia—are pitted against one another in Manchuria as bitterly today as they have ever been, and there is no diminution in intensity and bitterness.

In 1900 the Manchurian problem was complicated enough, with two great nations aware of the actual strategic and potential economic issues involved. In 1930 it is further complicated by the new nationalism of the educated Chinese, who proclaim Manchuria an integral part of the Chinese Republic and are determined to exercise the fullest sovereignty there by the abolition of all the acquired rights of the two nations whose efforts have developed Manchuria.

RUSSIA and Japan do not dispute the claim of China to sovereignty over Manchuria, and their relations with the Chinese Government (when one exists) and with the Mukden Government are, as the French would say, "most correct." But on the other hand they let it be known that under no circumstances will they give up their control of the two great railways that have enabled Manchuria to become what she is. Especially does Japan explain—and demonstrate by her actions—what treaty privileges she must continue to enjoy in order to maintain effective control of the South Manchurian Railway.

It is logical to enter Manchuria by the port of Dairen, terminus of the South Manchurian Railway, the unique organization created by the Mikado after the Russo-Japanese War and of which the Japanese Government is half owner. For one is impressed there with the place Manchuria has already won in international trade, and before taking the train is prepared for the revelation of agricultural wealth from the car window. Dairen was an insignificant hamlet when the Russians thought to make it their ice-free outlet to the ocean. But they had hardly started when the Japanese supplanted them. In thirty years Dairen has grown to a city of 300,000 that is quite unlike any other in the Far East. Given a free hand to plan and build, with no traditions to respect and existing structures to reckon with, the Japanese have constructed their twentieth-century pioneering genius. Dairen is neither Occidental nor Oriental, it is simply contemporary. Nowhere in Japan did we see finer hospitals, schools and parks. The arrangement and equipment of its wharves and warehouses are the last word in efficiency and adaptation to the electrical era. The Yamato Hotel would not be out of place on Park Avenue. The suburbs are lovely, and they make the most of a superb setting. On the motor road to Port Arthur we could not believe that we were in Asia. Certainly we were not in China!

Before coming here to talk over the Manchurian situation with the Chinese we traveled the entire length of the main lines of the South Manchurian Railway, first from Dairen to Changchun, where the Chinese Eastern Railway begins, and then from Mukden to Antung, at the mouth of the Yalu River, where a bridge over the wide river makes the connection with the Korean State Railway. Throughout the territory served by the South Manchurian Railway, boom conditions—as Americans understand that term—prevail. The contrast to the stagnation we saw in Central and Northern China is illuminating.

AT Changchun we transferred to the broader gauge Chinese Eastern Railway and went on to Harbin. There is no appreciable difference in the character of the country or its state of cultivation. The same intense activity of the wealth-producing plains was in evidence everywhere. Station platforms were piled high with bags of soya beans and millet. But we began to see more cattle. Hides and furs were awaiting transportation, and Mongolian herders mingled with the throngs of immigrant Chinese. We felt the Russian atmosphere from the moment we boarded the train at Changchun. But we were not prepared to disembark in a Russian city getting ready to celebrate Easter. Harbin is reputed to have a larger European population than any other city in Asia. In Pristin, the quarter constructed by the Russians when they were building the railway, and in the new city on the hill one sees few Chinese except the policemen directing traffic and an occasional group of soldiers.

Harbin is European in a much more real sense than Shanghai and

SANTA FE HAS ITS OWN ARCHITECTURE

Inspired by Indians And Spanish, It Is Now of Frankly Modern Type

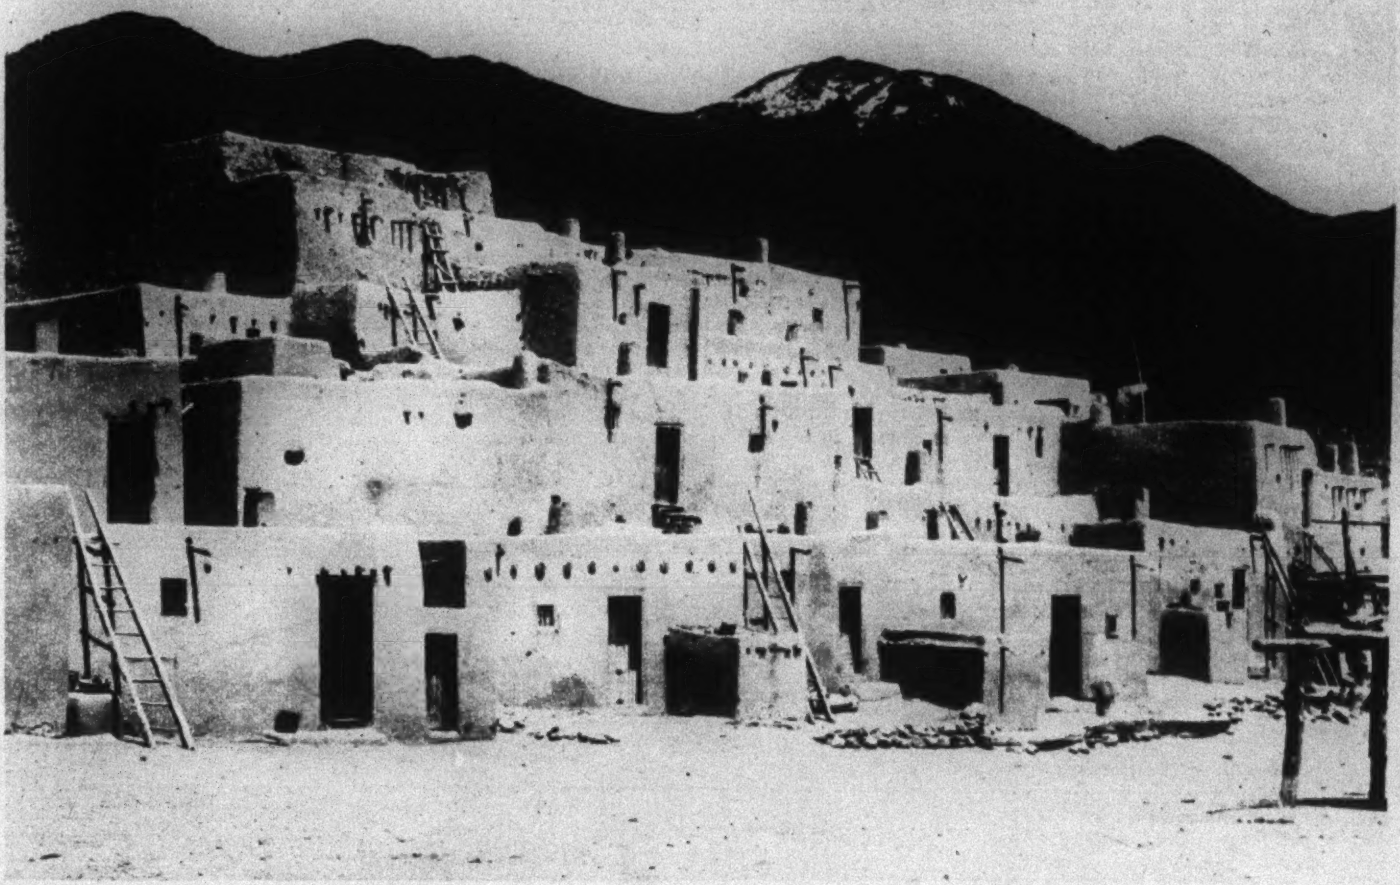
By MILDRED ADAMS

SANTA FE has developed a style of architecture all its own, so distinctive that people are beginning to speak of "the Santa Fe type," just as they speak of a Cape Cod cottage or a French château. Its newest example is to be the Anthropological Laboratory for the study of pre-white man civilization in the Southwest, and its broad possibilities are indicated by the fact that this is to be no single building, but a group of twenty-eight arranged so as to present the characteristics of a native village on a hill site.

For people who have never been there, it is not sufficient explanation to say that the Santa Fe style was inspired by Spanish Pueblo and is a combination of the Pueblo Indian house and the buildings developed from it by Spanish demands. None of those are very familiar to people whose paths lead from Wall Street to Westchester. One's memories of wigwams, of "Spanish-type" eruptions on Long Island, of the Mayan decorations on certain skyscrapers, are of little help. Nor is this a thing familiar to every transcontinental traveler. Native villages are shy things, and even Santa Fe, though a railroad carries its name from Chicago to the Pacific Coast, is so far off the main line that visitors usually come to it by motor from Lamy, or from Albuquerque, seventy miles away.

Perhaps this isolation has played its part in the development of Santa Fe architecture. Perhaps a railroad would have brought it blank-walled warehouses, tubular grain elevators, Italianate hotels and banks modeled after the Parthenon. As it is, Santa Fe has escaped much that justifies the popular belief that "all American towns look alike." To be sure, its State capital belongs to the frock-coat fashion of the '80s and its Gubernatorial mansion might have been moved in from any main street in Indiana or Nebraska. But those are merely traces of its American pioneer period. That was the Nordic expressing himself in an inarticulate outburst against this strange Indian-Latin environment.

The American population of Santa Fe is wiser now. It no longer protests. Instead it has taken the indigenous elements about it and combined and adapted them to its needs. A whole block of shops opens on a patio, the leading hotel is piled in a fashion unknown to New York, but perfectly familiar in Taos and Puyé. The Art Museum reminds one of an old Franciscan church, the high school, several business blocks, a garage and many private houses are built in the new-old fashion. Even the Postoffice Department has been persuaded to forego its beloved Grecian colonnades and take to thick walls, fluid lines and rounded corners.



The Pueblo of Another Age Still Nestling Under the Mountains at Taos, N. M.

THOSE are all characteristic of the Santa Fe style. It is an indigenous thing, growing out of the character and the history of the country, made out of native materials by native workmen following in traditional ways. It is as thoroughly individual as the architecture of Virginia or Chichen Itza, as completely a part of its environment as are the long low farmhouses with their trains of outbuildings that nestle in the New Hampshire hills.

To know how it came about, even to know what it looks like, you must first know something about the history and the landscape of New Mexico, and to know them is to set aside all preconceived ideas about the United States. Here are neither Puritan forefathers nor a rock-bound coast, green-clad hills nor gently fertile valleys. This is a land of far horizons and vivid coloring, whose very place names are in another tongue, a land where flat-topped mesas take the place of hills, where valleys become sharp-gashed canyons, where river banks turn into barrancas edging a dry wash.

Santa Fe itself is a hillside town, tilted up on a long slope so that from certain windows you may look across a sweep of flat roofs to the open country and the white-capped mountains where coyotes howl in the moonlight. The centre of it is a plaza, as was thought just and proper by the Spaniards who settled it at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Here the ox carts used to gather on market day, their solid wooden wheels churning up yellow dust, their oxen patient under the weight of crude yokes. Bewigged dignitaries in fat coaches rode pompously up to the palace of the Governors. Merchant caravans creaked in from Mexico. Long-haired Indians whooped about on horseback.

The plaza is a green park now, and automobiles roll silently around its four neat sides. The thick walls and the ancient beams of the palace of the Governors still welcome visitors, and Indians still ride quick ponies through the streets. Along one edge of the plaza a block of stores leads to a radio-lined way which satisfies the American hunger for a main street. Off the plaza the streets are narrow and winding, wrapped in a secret air more in keeping with Cordoba of Spain than with the capital of one of the States of the great American republic.

This curious combination of Indian, Spanish, American colors every facet of life. Bargain sales and legal actions are advertised in Spanish and English. You may buy anything in any shop with either tongue. Brisk tourists jostle slow-moving Indian women shawled and petticoated till they look like pyramids. Slim youths in tight-hipped jeans lounge against adobe walls and cast lazy Spanish comment after fussy visitors in wide knickers. Prim red brick houses hold up peaked roofs in righteous protest against the Latin indolence that sprawls its adobe length next door. A street of artists' homes—some of them lovely old buildings recently reclaimed from ruin—wanders away into the open country. Every morning the panniered donkeys trot into town loaded with logs for Santa Fe's fires, and every evening the blue smoke of burning cedar rises above tiled roofs to spread like incense in the clear air.

ACCORDING to John Gaw Meem, who is architect of the new Anthropological Laboratory, the origin of the style which bears the town's name lies in "the Pueblo Indian fortress type of architecture built for defense which became adaptable to modern uses by the adoption of the Spanish plan and certain details. The purest examples of so-called Spanish pueblo type of architecture are found in the early Franciscan missions, of which many still exist."

That, to any one who has visited New Mexico, calls up pictures of the ruins of Pecos Pueblo melting slowly into the red-brown earth from which it was made, of the cliff-dweller caves at Puyé, the soft white mission of Laguna, the church in sullen Santo Domingo, the piled houses of Taos and Tesuqué. There is about them, as about those buildings which are their conscious-successors in Santa Fe, an indescribable charm, a sense

Tientsin. The Russians have the air of belonging. They are not foreigners in Harbin. They opened up this country. They developed it. They are not thinking of getting out. They withstood the attempt of the Chinese to take over the railway last year, and the tragic breach of the White Russian exiles with the motherland from which they had fled is at last beginning to be healed. We learned from good authority that of the eighty-odd thousand Russians in Harbin 45,000 are now registered at the consulate and have applied for papers.

RETURNING to Mukden, we should have been in the mood to regard the heart of Manchuria as being irretrievably in the possession of the outsiders who divided it in 1905 had it not been for the constant stream of immigrants—Chinese of sturdy stock from Shantung and Chihli and Shansi—swarming in and around the railway stations at Dairen, Tashingchiao, Lishan, Mukden, Ssupingkai, Kwangchengtzu and Harbin. There was no end to them. From the train window we could see them trudging along the road, too. They carried their household possession with them. The women had little babies and other wee children underfoot. The men were of all ages from decrepit grandfathers to youngsters in their teens.

Had we not had experience with war refugees in Europe we should have looked upon this mass migration as a unique sight. These people are refugees too, fleeing from the chaotic conditions in their home provinces. They are the fit who have survived famine and pillage and who had the courage to strike out for Manchuria when life in China became intolerable. For years they have been pouring into Manchuria every Spring. A full million came last year. In 1930 they are arriving by steamer and junk, thousands every day, and although some are single men, seasonal laborers who intend to return after the harvest, the great bulk of them have broken with the past and are here to cast in their fortunes with Manchuria.

It is estimated that the population of Manchuria has doubled within the last twenty years. The growth from 12,000,000 to 25,000,000 is 95 per cent Chinese, and the largest part of the increase is due to immigrant farmers from North China. Without this immigration, of course, Manchuria could not have gone forward as she has done. Providing means of communication and developing natural resources, for which Russians and Japanese take credit, are factors in the creation of Manchuria's wealth that were indispensable. But the influx of colonists to till the soil was equally indispensable. This factor China provided. Russia and Japan did not.

It is well enough to cite impressive figures and to talk in glowing terms of what Japan has done and is doing for Manchuria. Japan has accomplished miracles. So has Russia. But neither one nor the other of these powers has sent colonists in large number. Manchuria, despite its nearness to Japan and the supposed tremendous pressure of population upon food supply in Japan, has not proved to be the attractive colonizing field, the safety valve, that it was confidently expected to be. From this point of view the Japanese failure is as striking as the success in other directions. Nor has Russia done in Northern Manchuria what she accomplished, though slowly, in Siberia.

The Chinese hold tenaciously to land control in Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. After the initial trunk line rail construction was completed by Russian and Japanese concessionaires they still had recourse to Japan for capital and expert assistance. But all the newer railways—and they are many—are owned by the Chinese. With the exception of the line from Changchun to Kirin, which the South Manchurian Railway operates on lease, the Chinese manage their own railways, which will shortly equal in mileage those under foreign control.

In order to strengthen their political position in Manchuria Chinese of rival factions recently agreed to the Nanking Government's creation of three new provinces along the Mongolian frontier, north of the Great Wall. The easternmost of these, Jehol, is formed of the portion of Chihli north of the Great Wall and the portion of Inner Mongolia bordering on Manchuria. It has been placed under the administrative control of the Governor of Fengtien (Mukden) province, who inherited from his father the chairmanship of the three eastern provinces, which have now become, in 1930, the four eastern provinces. Of course this was simply the recognition of a long-standing de facto situation. Chang Tso-lin, father of Chang Hsueh-liang, was in effective military control of this border country and it is now occupied with impressive military forces down to the point where the Great Wall reaches the sea at Shanhaikwan.

The Manchu city at Mukden is surrounded by picturesque stone walls. Outside it is the still larger Chinese city, surrounded by a mud wall. Outside the Chinese city the people have overflowed in several directions, new quarters going up overnight. Between Mukden and the railway station is the Japanese concession with broad avenues and fine buildings. In the heart of the Manchu city, and in the midst of a formidable garrison, lives the young Manchurian ruler, Chang Hsueh-liang. How accurately Mukden represents the Manchurian situation! Japanese—foreign—within the shadow of the railway, but beyond that nothing but Chinese. Manchus have been swallowed up by Chinese, who are multiplying daily. Deriving his strength and protection from their very number, and therefore living in their midst, is the arrogant young ruler, who knows that the Russians may plant and the Japanese may water, but his people give the increase!

Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang, whatever may be his weaknesses, is devoted to China. Like other leaders, he is unwilling to surrender to the ideal of political unity one jot or tittle of his absolute power. But he realizes the value of symbolical unity and the support both of Nanking and Peking in opposing the encroachments of Russia and Japan. He contributes no military aid to either faction, but he is meticulous at the same time to state that the Chinese have one country, whose flag he flies, and that his allegiance to the government of China (when it is finally formed) is whole-hearted.

That he is forward-looking and realizes what China must have to emancipate herself from foreign tutelage is proved by the expansion of Northeastern University since he succeeded his father. This provincial institution of higher learning receives large grants from Chang Hsueh-liang's private purse. It is his pride and hobby. On its campus near the Manchu tombs, several miles from the city, buildings that would do credit to any American university have been erected or are in the process of construction.

MANCHURIA is a vast land with untold possibilities. The soya beans and millet and wheat, the cattle and draft animals, the furs, the timber, the coal and oil and iron, the possibilities for rice—one's imagination is captured by the contrast between thirty years ago and today and the thought of what is ahead. Japan dreams of a second Dairen, on the coast of Korea, to be the outlet of Central Manchuria. Russia thinks of what Vladivostok may become when Northern Manchuria is developed. China complacently says: "All this is mine, now and tomorrow. I own this country and my people inhabit it. When the Chinese have learned how to manage everything themselves I shall thank the foreigners for what they have done, but they must know that their time of exploitation is up."

The 1929 attempt to take over the Chinese Eastern Railway was a premature indication of the intention of the Chinese. When the Russians demonstrated that they were ready to fight it out the Chinese had to back down. Russians and Japanese know that their best policy in Manchuria is to win the cooperation of the Chinese, and this they have consistently followed, with some measure of success. But if the new nationalism frustrates that cooperation they still do not expect to be put out—now or tomorrow. When the attempt is made there will be very big trouble indeed.

From the Wonderful Old Links of Scotland the Gospel of Golf Has Been Carried to the Ends of the Earth. A Scene at Muirfield.

GOLF IN SCOTLAND IS SOLEMN EXERCISE

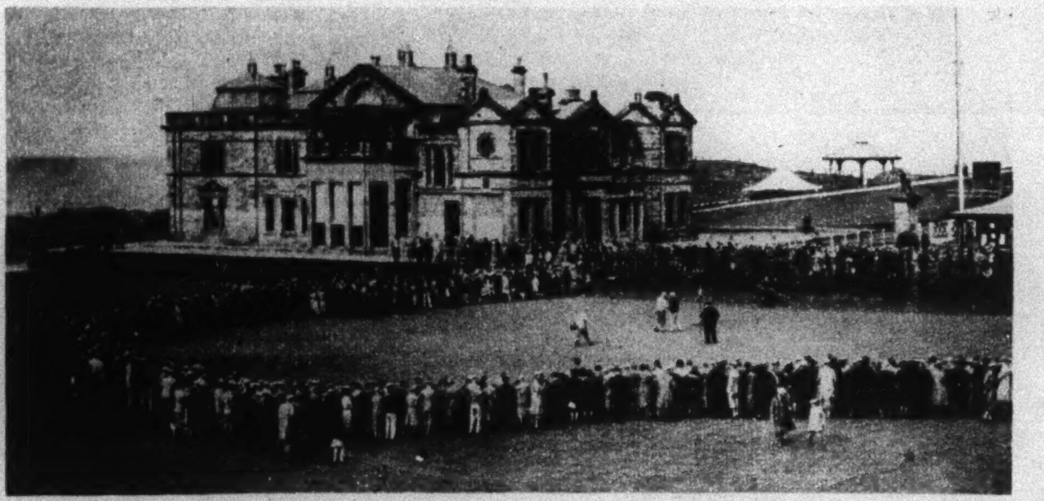
There It Is No Joking Matter, but Free and Simple, Unconquered by Plus-Fours and Dollar Nassaus

LONDON.

SANDY HERD thinks that the British lost the Walker Cup because of their methods of selecting the team. Sandy swears that a team of amateurs to beat the American team could have been found among the working men's golf clubs of Scotland. In other words, Bobby Jones and the rest of the Walker Cup team could have been repulsed at Sandwich last May by eight coal miners from Lanarkshire, with a Glasgow taxi driver in reserve. This is a most cruel and unusual idea. The only explanation of how it could have occurred to an otherwise kindly and likable golfer is that Sandy is himself a Scot and Scotland is the one country in which golf still leads the simple life.

There are, of course, other countries than Scotland in which workingmen play golf, but only as a novelty of comparatively recent origin. As the Scots see it, what happened when the rest of the world suddenly took up their game forty or fifty years ago was that somebody made a mess of his drive. When the first foreigner teed up in Scotland and drove the little Scottish ball to the ends of the earth, what he did was to bunker it among the upper and upper middle classes abroad, and there it has remained ever since. All the complicated and expensive business of club dues, initiation fees, red umbrellas, chamois waistcoats, dollar nassaus and two-bits-a-hole bets—all this upper and upper middle-class business—is no more than a bit of rough country in which the wee white ba' has got itself bunkered abroad.

This is as the Scots see it. There are, of course, plus-fours and side bets in Scottish golf, but that is far from the whole story. The great thing to remember about golf in Scotland is that James II chose an Edinburgh shoemaker to be his partner on the Leith links in 1681 and Scottish shoemakers have been going down to the sea wi' clubs ever since. In this conjunction of golf and shoemakers the Scots see nothing incongruous. Indeed, the difficulty in trying to get a Scot to take a reasonable view of golf, lies in the fact that the ordinary Scot is himself a shoemaker playing his golf at a penny a round.



The Clubhouse of Venerable St. Andrew's.

How can you explain to such a man that the use of overalls on a golf course is hardly the usual thing, to say the very least? How can you make him see that the glory of golf has been its brightening of the stubborn gloom of civilian male attire with the variegated verdure of Lossiemouth plaids, Donegal woolens and smoked elk shoes—a glory to which no other game has ever attained? It is probable that the ordinary Scot, if you were to put such a proposition to him, would have no idea what you were talking about. Or, if a faint glimmer of your meaning were to reach him, you would be met with a denial that golf is a game at all, and if you have seen the tombstones in the churchyard of St. Andrew's Cathedral and have noted the number of golfers who have taken their clubs with them into the next world, it would be difficult for you not to agree.

The fact is that the Scots are a solemn people and Scottish golf, like Scottish theology, is a solemn exercise. You may discuss its doctrine and dogma just as you discuss the doctrine and dogma of the kirk. You may spend a Scottish Sabbath in the Imperial's lounge at St. Andrew's arguing heatedly as to whether the second hole on the Old Course was the result of direct or indirect inspiration. But the main precepts of golf you must accept without question, and it is the very first of its precepts that golf, like the kirk, is the business of every immortal soul.

Hence the universality of Scottish golf. It is an exercise wide open to everybody—clerks, professional men, workingmen, even tradesmen. A few are members of expensive clubs with private links of their own. More are ratepayers entitled, with their wives and children, to free golf on their burgh links. Most of them shoulder their own clubs and play on public links at a shilling or sixpence or even a penny a round. It is hopeless to try to explain to a Scot that golf at a penny a round is hardly fair to poor millionaires in foreign countries who sometimes have to spend $5,000 a year on club dues alone. On the other hand, it is equally hopeless to try to disregard the Scots in these matters, for Scotland is the pulpit from which the world-wide crusade of golf has been preached.

HAVING already converted the world's upper and upper middle classes to golf, the Scots, being inveterate preachers, are now aiming at the conversion of its lower classes. Already they have begun to impose workingmen's golf on England. The new municipal courses in England are open to everybody, and in a few cases private clubs have thrown open their courses to the workingmen of the neighborhood at certain fixed hours every week. So it is now possible in some places for an English workingman to shoulder his two or three clubs and hack his way around a good course at a modest expense.

The English take a great deal of quiet pride in this, for it shows what a genius they have for swap-

VISITORS SHOW NEW YORK THE NEW YORK MANNER

Cosmopolites for a Day, They Increase in Number and Set A Determined Pace of Going, Seeing, Spending

"Women Are Always Willing to Go on a Window-Shopping Tour."

By GEORGE H. COPELAND

NEW YORK is becoming visitor-minded. Not content with its newest population figures showing that there are nearly enough people here now, steamship lines, railroad companies, theatres, hotels and taxicab companies have banded together to lure the wide world to take a look at the city, especially in the Summer when a good part of New York runs away. California and Canada must look to their laurels.

In addition to advertising, science has been enlisted in the campaign. Recently a psychologist from Colgate University made an analysis of the 400 guests at a city hotel and found that four out of five actually slept while the fifth spent a good part of the night thinking, planning and plotting, or listening to the street clatter. Which goes far to disprove a theory that the people who visit New York devote most of the dark hours to making whoopee at the night clubs and being trimmed by sellers of gold bricks.

Native New Yorkers—if there are any such persons—go hurriedly about their business and read with complacency that the population of their city is now nearly 7,000,000 and that by 1965 it will be around 20,000,000. Visitors mean little to them. Occasionally they get a phone call to the effect that Cousin Jim and his wife are in town and want to be entertained. Then, if they have time, they scurry around for theatre tickets and brush up their neglected dress clothes. For they have to conform to the general opinion which Cousin Jim and his wife, together with the greater part of the million or so who visit New York in a year, have of the metropolis which contains Broadway.

To fix the exact number of persons visiting New York in a year is, of course, impracticable, since "casuals" come in droves from all directions, usually for purposes of pleasure. But in the year ended April 30, 1930, New York staged 1,001 conventions or business conferences, and these brought—including the buyers of merchandise—some 800,000 to the city. To put the casuals, &c., at an additional 200,000 would not seem an exaggeration.

The general desire of these people, while it cannot be defined with any more exactness than can their numbers, is to do things in the way which they have always fondly determined is the New York manner. This attitude, some New Yorkers point out, helps to support the theatre ticket speculators and keeps the cost of many amusements, luxuries and semi-luxuries high.

A couple, for instance, recently visited our city from Detroit. The husband had some business to transact; his firm, national in scope, was staging a conference of its branch managers. On arrival the pair taxied to a small hotel near the theatre district. Their funds were not great; they wanted to make them go as far as possible. They stayed in this hotel one day, then found that the rest of the conferees were staying at a larger, more pretentious establishment. Moving over to the big hotel, where expenses were twice as high, took them practically no time.

THEY wanted to go to the theatre in the evening, and had heard, in Detroit, of some of the big hits. Nothing less would do them. And did they go to the box office, bargain for their tickets, and go some night when they could get seats at a reasonable price? They did not. They wanted to go that night, so they sent down to the hotel office for their tickets and paid for them.

The Detroiters had some relatives living uptown on the west side. They received careful directions to take the Broadway express subway; nevertheless, they got on a Bronx train, and on finding themselves lost in that maze taxied across to the west side. After this lesson they obtained minute instructions as to how to get to their relatives' apartment by subway, but on the next visit they did not darken the subway station doors at all. Cabs, from then on, were their only means of transportation.

The husband loudly proclaimed that he was spending too much money, that he went to the office tired out after late hours the night before, that his body was on the job but his mind was semi-petrified. Did he stay home nights and save money? Yes, until about 9 o'clock. Then, feeling fit and eager to do the city again in the New York mode, he and his wife were off to the night clubs and saying good-bye to more hard-earned dollars. And so on, until the purse was flat as the East River. Free advice from New Yorkers as to how to get things accomplished in a better and cheaper fashion was ignored; everything had to be done in a big way.

The curious psychology of the visitor to New York is shown in a number of tendencies. The great majority go to a hotel and ask for a "room with bath." They seldom ask the rate, although in other cities they would always bargain a little for their accommodations. In some New York hotels now, because of this trait, price slips are given to those registering. The guests are thus forced to be a bit businesslike. In every move they make, according to those who have had to deal with them, they show an obvious reluctance to leave any clue that they are strangers. It must appear that they know their New York.

BUSINESS men attending conventions here usually receive badges on which their names and home towns are inscribed. But, once they leave the convention hall or ballroom, they remove the telltale emblems. They must seem to be New Yorkers, not strangers from Kenosha or Dubuque, regardless of the fact that a large number of the city's leaders in professions and industries came originally from other places.

Visitors often come to New York with preconceived ideas as to its nature and with very definite ideas as to what they want to do and see. When New Yorkers who attend to the entertainment of convention visitors obtain a block of 1,000 tickets to a certain show, it is seldom that more than 400 of them are used and never more than 600 will go to see the entertainment selected. The others have heard of something else that sounded better—on paper—and to it they traipse regardless of expense. In the old days the Hippodrome could always be offered as the pièce de résistance and its selection would receive unanimous approval. But no similar arrangement would do now.

Amusements and sports events attract many to this city. Talking pictures, in penetrating the country, have to a certain extent replaced the road shows, and many come here for the legitimate shows they cannot see at home. Probably not more than a dozen American cities have kept their drama. New Orleans, formerly a popular tourist city partly because of its shows, recently followed the trend by dropping its legitimate theatre. As the drama tourists usually carry to New York a list of the plays they want to see, it takes more than a ticket speculator to keep them away or make them change their choices, even for

KING SILVER'S MEXICAN EMPIRE TOTTERS

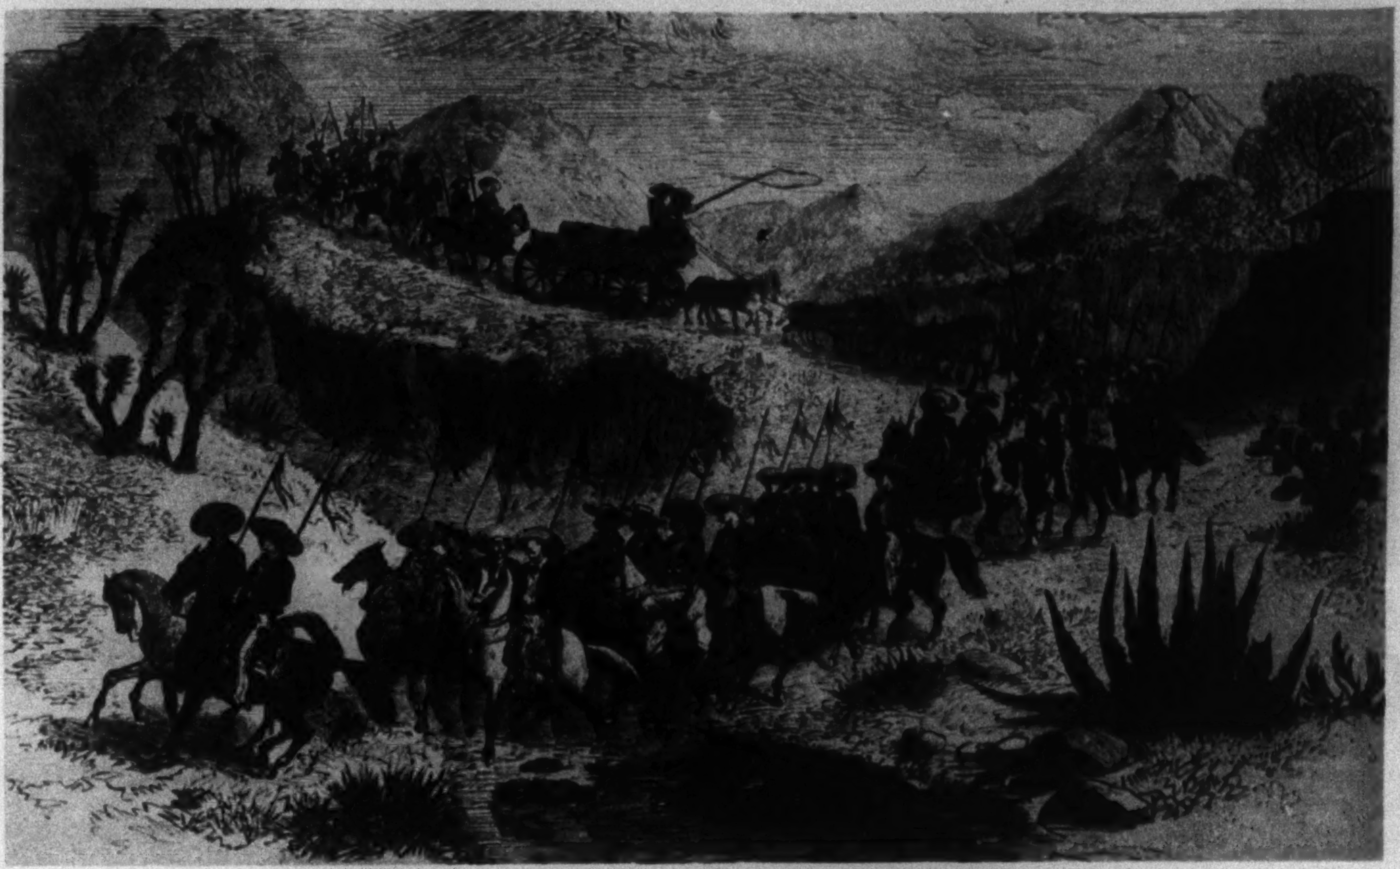
After Four Centuries Its Rich Mines Are Now Faced With a Low Demand

By DUNCAN AIKMAN

IF within two years the price of an outstanding American industrial product supplying more than half the world demand dropped 50 per cent, the resulting disturbance would doubtless extend even further than the one set up by the late collapse of the stock market. If the collapsed industry, besides, were one which had preeminently sustained the nation's earning and purchasing power for centuries, its prostration would appear as a first-class economic tragedy. Such an affliction threatens Mexico this year in the unprecedented crash in the world silver market.

In the four centuries since the Spanish conquest Mexico has produced from two to three fifths of the world's silver supply—an officially reported total of more than $3,000,000,000. Down to 1930 it remained one of the two or three outstanding sources of the nation's income. Now that within two years the price of silver has declined from above 60 to 34 cents, the calamitous results are far worse proportionately than would be produced, for example, by the collapse of a leading industry in the United States.

Silver's 1930 drop is due to an unprecedented decrease in demand. The real blow to Mexico's silver prosperity comes from the great Oriental States of India and China, which for years have been moving gradually toward the demonetization of the white metal and the establishment of the gold standard. Although the goal has not yet been reached by either government, enough progress has been made to check demand and lead to the disposal of silver even among their own populations.



A Mexican Silver Train and Its Convoy in the Earlier Days of Mining.

From a Drawing in Harper's Weekly.

These crushing developments have changed silver into something which the dozen generations of promoters and prospectors from Hernando Cortez to John Hays Hammond would find difficult to understand. A hundred years ago, when old Francisco Iriarte of Culiacan was offered a $500,000 a year lease on his mine at Guadalupe, Sinaloa, his answer was that he did not need money, and if he did he could go into his ore veins and dig it. To these glamourous generations finding silver ore was the same as finding money, and finding a rich vein or a mother lode was the same as founding a princely fortune.

The government and the Mexican and American leaders of the silver industry are endeavoring to face the crisis realistically. Official projects are under way for reducing the tax on silver to a nominal figure until it regains a 50-cent quotation on the New York markets. To keep Mexico's most romantic industry, prospecting, alive, fees and imposts on claims—pertinencias—are to be virtually waived until silver once more has the standing of a metal worth hunting for. A practically absolute ban has been placed on the reimportation of the scores of millions of old Mexican trade dollars piling up in the Oriental ports, and, indeed, on the importation of all forms of foreign silver coinage. Finally, under joint Mexican and American auspices, an industrial research organization is shortly to be set up in Mexico City to find new uses for silver in industry and the arts.

Mexico's feeling for her silver wealth as a romantic possession dies hard. For the white metal's glamourous phase in Mexican economics began within a year after Cortez had smashed the Aztec power in the valley of Mexico.

With the Conquistador General's cordial approval, half of the invading force were self-appointed prospectors. As soon as it was safe for them to travel without the bulk of the army for an escort, they were out in the mountains hunting for the precious ore from which the Aztecs had made their personal ornaments and the sacred temple place.

Nobody in Europe in the sixteenth century knew anything about the underground behavior of mother lodes or even, except in a highly vague way, that mother lodes existed. But in 1549 some experimenter came upon a vein in San Bernabe, near Guanajuato, and tunneled a gallery along it, learning how mother lodes twist and turn. The Mellado and Rayas mines, there developed, remained big producing properties well into the nineteenth century, and from these and similar "strikes" the Spanish colonial miners gained a reputation that lasted 250 years for being the best diviners of mother lode courses anywhere.

In the same period another of Mexico's amateur miners made what was possibly the most revolutionary practical discovery in the history of the precious metals industry—the use of mercury in amalgamating silver. President Hoover and Mrs. Hoover in their translation of Agricola's text on mining assert that the principle was known in Europe fifteen or twenty years earlier by an Italian named Biringuccio. But all the evidence is to the effect that Biringuccio understood it only in a laboratory sense. Its employment by Bartolome de Medina to separate silver from rock tailings and baser metals in the Pachuca mines in 1557 was an independent practical experiment.

ON Mexico's "get-rich-quick" romance, the discovery of mercury amalgamation had tremendous consequences. It improved the efficiency of the ore extraction processes over the primitive methods handed down from the Romans and the medieval alchemists even more sharply than did the introduction of the cyanide process in the smelting industry in the '90s. Out of it grew a new technical and financial organization of silver production as an industry. Shrewder and possibly less adventurous Spaniards found that surer profits were to be made out of extracting silver than out of hunting and mining it. So in the next half century, whenever a promising mining camp sprang up, huge haciendas arose which made a business of reducing ores to their pure state for the miners.

Carried to the pit mouths by Indian workmen, the ore was broken by hand and driven in oxcarts to the hacienda patio. There it was ground fine in mule-power mills, slimed with salt and mercury, sun dried in the bright mountain air, slimed and trodden again by mule and man power until finally the impurities were dried off and the pure silver remained to be melted into bars and shipped to the viceregal mints and treasuries.

This "patio process" endured in Mexico beyond its time and was in use in the more remote sections for years after independence. By modern standards it was, of course, highly wasteful of both silver and mercury. It had the advantage of creating for the silver industry a class of steadily rich capitalists. Century in and century out, then, these grub-staked prospectors and mine proprietors in years when big veins showed lean streaks. In periods of depression they financed the mining country merchants and, in still greater emergencies, they grub-staked the State, the Church, the army and even, more than once, the king in Madrid.

ENO
THE WORLD-FAMED EFFERVESCENT
SALT

For the person whose spirit and body are handicapped by headaches, sick fatigue and the other noxious symptoms that usually indicate intestinal toxicity, business becomes but unsuccessful drudgery. Yet it really is not necessary to let intestinal toxicity . . . poisons arising out of constipation . . . spoil your life.

Thousands are combating intestinal toxicity with natural means, with a balanced diet that includes fresh vegetables, exercise in the open air and plenty of drinking water. In addition, especially while going the exacting pace of the modern world, a degree of assistance usually is necessary. For over half a century such assistance has been gently and safely rendered by Eno Effervescent Salt.

Eno leisurely flushes the intestinal tract and helps stabilize normal action. It does not gripe or disturb the day's routine and it never leaves one "all dragged out." Furthermore, its antacid qualities are helpful in some cases of acidosis.

This pleasant-tasting effervescent salt is at all druggists at 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd., London, England; Buffalo, N. Y.; Toronto, Canada; Paris; Berlin and Madrid. Mothers!

Here's an easy, healthful way to give children
summertime "treats"

It is hard to get children to drink enough water, because water tastes so flat. They will gladly drink a whole glass of delicious Clicquot Club Golden—and it's even better for them than water!

THIS treat delights every child, gives him needed liquid and quick energy, and actually makes appetites better. Buy a bottle or two of Clicquot Club Golden ginger ale . . . open one when you get home. Fill up sparkling glasses for the children . . . see the happy smiles all around.

THEN notice this. Besides the delicious flavor, this beverage has a bracing effect that is visible immediately. It contains "invert" sugar, one of the quickest energy-producers known to dietitians.

Add carbonation, the essence of fine Jamaica ginger root and syrups made from real fruit flavors, and you have this real energy beverage in a most delicious form. Spirits rise . . . the next meal disappears with gusto.

Ageing makes mellow flavor

There's a mellow smoothness about Clicquot Club Golden because the flavor is blended and perfected by six months of ageing in the making. So many ginger ales are made hastily and the flavors are given no chance to ripen. The Clicquot Club name is your assurance of getting real aged ginger ale. And remember, ageing makes ginger ale far more healthful for you and the children.

For your protection Clicquot Club is sold only in clean, new bottles. Unclean bottles are a real menace to health! To avoid second-hand bottles, tell your dealer that it is "Clicquot Club" you want.

Women appreciate the true economy that they find in Clicquot Club. Not only a better, purer ginger ale, but a full-measure pint, the size that you will find most convenient and most economical. Buy Clicquot Club standard pints and you can always open just what you want—and always have it tingling fresh!

PERCHED on the windward gunwale their expert eyes travel from jib to mainsail and back again . . . alert to take advantage of the light, fair breeze . . . hearing the sing of ropes . . . feeling the push of the tiller as a strong hand holds her to the wind.

These are the sun-tanned men, the sportsmen who race in bay and harbor . . . alert, slim, lithe through exercise, courageous and high of heart . . . these are the men who find keenness and vigor, a matching quality of sportsmanship in "Canada Dry" ginger ale.

Vigor and exhilaration are the qualities of "Canada Dry"

And rightly. For here is a wonderful, exhilarating beverage, thirst-quenching and delightful, delicious and refreshing. It exactly suits men and women who live in the great outdoors.

Its very foundation is "Liquid Ginger"—which we make from selected Jamaica ginger root by a special process. This process is exclusively controlled by us and, unlike any other method, retains for "Canada Dry" all of the original aroma, flavor and natural essence of the ginger root. Rigid laboratory control assures uniformity, purity and highest quality. A special process of carbonation enables "Canada Dry" to retain its sparkle long after the bottle has been opened. Such are our careful methods. Notice them as you drink.

Its prestige and distinction are known the world over

And the result—a marvelous ginger ale, a beverage which has won the approving nod of connoisseurs the wide world over . . . served in many New York hotels and clubs . . . in London . . . in Paris . . . in the Houses of Parliament at Ottawa . . . and in countless homes throughout this country and Canada.

Serve "Canada Dry" in your home. Let its keenness add more zest to dinner. Let its graciousness express your hospitality. Offer it to your friends when they come in to see you. Order "Canada Dry" in the Hostess Package of twelve bottles. Then you will always have plenty on hand . . . convenient . . . sensible.

FAINT RUMBLINGS OF THE NEW THEATRICAL SEASON

GOSSIP OF THE RIALTO

The Managers Smile at Last—Louis Bromfield and a Revue?—And the Vacillating Mr. George Jessel

A FEW days of cooler weather brought the playgoers out in force, and the Rialto was filled with boasts of sold-out houses as the week waxed on. On one night it was estimated that 2,500 persons had been turned away from Mr. Leblang's cut-rate counters, and the managers of several fair-to-middling shows were fully convinced that they were proprietors of smash hits. It is somewhat sad to reflect that it is not always August, nor is it always cool. Nor, for that matter, are there always so few entertainments in the town.

Irving Berlin is back in this town from Hollywood, but not for purposes of theatrical production. In another ten days he will turn around and go back, being mightily busy with a talking picture.

They say that Jed Harris has once more been drawn into some sort of advisory association with Mr. Rose's forthcoming revue, "Corned Beef and Roses." At the very least, it seems, he will stage the sketches. . . . There was a midweek rumor that Mr. Jessel would be found cavorting in this entertainment, along with Miss Brice. Just before that Mr. Jessel was busy with a musical show from Germany—a novel affair in which actors and audience mingle to so complete an extent that they never do tell each other apart. Mr. Jessel is a volatile fellow, and you never can tell just what he'll turn to.

Tales of the self-absorption of Hollywood being what they are, one fact in connection with the recent visit of Jed Harris to that city is worth setting down. For it seems that Charles Chaplin, who is supposed to keep in somewhat closer touch with the outside world than do some of his confrères, never had heard of Mr. Harris. Just not at all.

Now here is strange news from a Los Angeles paper. It says, in effect, that Louis Bromfield has been engaged by Florenz Ziegfeld to write a revue—not a musical comedy, mind you, but a revue—in which Marilyn Miller and the Astaires will appear. There will be, however, "a thread of story." . . . It may be true, of course, but the chances are against it. Mr. Bromfield doesn't sound like the sort of fellow who would write anything so frivolous as a revue, in the first place, and William Anthony Maguire has been writing the Miller-Astaire show for several months, in the second. Although it must be admitted that that doesn't mean that he has done any work. At all events Mr. Ziegfeld is due home from Canada any minute now, and maybe he will be willing to tell.

Anne Nichols, who shut up shop and went to the Coast some months ago, is back in New York. But it seems to be definite that she is through with the theatre.

Mr. Goetz is trying hard to get his musical show called "The New Yorkers" ready for October production. It is apparently designed as a companion piece to "Fifty Million Frenchmen," and will have Fred Waring's orchestra and Frances Williams in its line-up, with a further probability of the James Durante trio. Mr. Waring's contract, they say, calls for an opening not later than two weeks after Oct. 6. Or, to sum the thing right up, Oct. 20.

George Manker Watters, who wrote most of "Burlesque," has made ready a new one named "American Tempo," and plans to open it here next month with Vivienne Osborne in its chief rôle. It is something rather big, calling for an orchestra of sixteen, as well as a good deal of scenery. Mr. Watters is producing it himself.

They are uncertain fellows, these producers. Brock Pemberton has been listing three plays as his season's fare, and it might have been assumed that his first production of the year would be drawn from this trio. But now it seems that he is on the track of a fourth play, and naturally that is the one that he plans to produce first. . . . Or "Why Playwrights Shoot Themselves."

Further peripatetic items are to the effect that Helen Hayes got back from the Coast during the week, and that Ruth Gordon, who was visiting her, is also back. And Lorenz Hart, who landed from the Coast on Monday, lingered but two days, sailing on Wednesday for London and the musical show called "Ever Green," for which he and Mr. Rodgers furnish lyrics and tunes, respectively.

The Shuberts have informed the Actors' Equity Association, which likes to know about such things, that they are bringing over at least ten English companies to act in as many English plays this season. They feel, it is said, that the recent collapse of "On the Q.-T." in the provinces was due to the fact that it was an English play not acted by an English company, although returned travelers who saw the play in London report that it was pretty bad even there.

The tale runs that Earl Carroll has offered Al Jolson the sum of $12,000 weekly to appear in a revue—presumably the one to be called "Personalities." Considering that Mr. Carroll proposes to put six or eight stars into that entertainment, and that the others will surely cost him an additional $12,000, if not more, one is tempted to do a little figuring. . . . Presumably Mr. Jolson has not yet given an answer. He is known to look upon regular stage work with reluctance, but the amount is one that might easily tempt him. His picture earnings were said at one time to approximate $30,000 a week, but in these times maybe they have not stayed at that figure.

An entertainment called "The Vanderbilt Revue"—and a very good title it is—is a possibility for the Vanderbilt Theatre later in the season. Lew Fields would be involved.

Mrs. Fiske will go a-touring again this season, and plans to carry no less than five plays along. All of them, of course, are pieces in which she has already appeared.

Philip Goodman wants Hortense Alden for the play called "Another Language," and Miss Alden is acting in "Lysistrata" at the moment, and there you are. So, for one reason or another, "Another Language" will be put off until later in the season.

In another week or so Mr. Gillette will decide whether he wants to resume his farewell tour in "Sherlock Holmes" during the Fall and Winter months. In the event he decides on a continuance of the play, he will visit cities, towns and hamlets not included in last season's triumphal travels.

The new Marcel Pagnol play, "Fanny," which Gilbert Miller is reported to control for this metropolis, is a continuation of "Marius," which Mr. Miller intends to make known here early in the Fall. The action of "Fanny" begins just ten minutes after "Marius" ends, and there is some talk in Paris, where "Fanny" will be done next month by the cast which played "Marius," of staging the two plays on the same day, one in the afternoon and one in the evening.

Howard Lindsay and Bertrand Robinson have just finished a play which bears the title "Oh, Promise Me." Those who have read it say that it is considerably different from "Tommy" and "Your Uncle Dudley." Mr. Lindsay is at present directing rehearsals of "The Up and Up," in which his wife, Dorothy Stickney, has the leading rôle.

Pertinent news from London is approximately as follows:

Noel Coward's new play, "Private Lives," will open in Edinburgh tomorrow night. Besides the author and Gertrude Lawrence the cast will include Laurence Olivier and Adrianne Allen. . . . A new one by Somerset Maugham is on the late Autumn schedule of the Vaudeville Theatre. They say it will be a commentary on the ways and manners of modern youth and that Ronald Squires will be in it. . . . Maurice Browne is now planning a London subscription group on the lines of the New York Theatre Guild. He recently gave a luncheon at the Savoy to set forth his ideas, which seem to be "to build a permanent audience in London for plays that are not generally considered commercial, with a permanent company and, if the experiment succeeds, a permanent theatre." The project will be tried for three years, by which time Mr. Browne hopes it will be self-supporting if not downright profitable. The Little Theatre has been taken for the first play, which will be "The Unknown Warrior."

THE CONSERVATOIRE FACES ITS CRITICS

PARIS, July 28.

NEVER has the July weather in Paris been more favorable to play-going and never have the theatres which are open done so well. But never, by a curious irony, have there been so few open at this time of the year. Putting aside musical plays, music halls and revues, as well as English plays (which are being given in two houses), there are only seven theatres open in Central Paris.

Most of the leading actors and actresses are resting in the mountains or by the sea, or are acting in the fashionable watering places instead of in Paris, where such theatrical activity as there is consists of discussions of general problems concerning the life of the theatre, and especially its relations with the State.

Enthusiastic playgoers who are not French often envy France her two State theatres, her two State opera houses, and her Conservatoire, where singers, musicians and actors are trained by the State. They believe that the money which is devoted by the government to the subsidy of these institutions is well spent, and they admire the way in which the whole system maintains a sound artistic tradition. In France, on the other hand, where these good things have long existed, the fashion is to find fault with them. I have already given you an account of the protests against the awards of the "jury" at the recent annual competition of the Conservatoire. Now various critics are openly saying that all of the Conservatoire's training in acting has become a farce; that so-called pupils are admitted to it who are really experienced actors and have joined merely in order to obtain the advertisement of one of the annual prizes; and that neither the pupils themselves nor the eminent actors who give the instruction any longer take the thing seriously. The complaint is not new. Ten years ago the story was told that Truffier met Paul Mounet one day and said, "I have just come from my class at the Conservatoire. Would you believe it? When I arrived at 10:30, not one of my pupils had yet turned up." "My class was different," said Mounet. "When I got there at 12:15, they had all gone."

There are other criticisms. One complains that literary men like Marcel Prévost are useless as members of the "jury," and that the acting classes suffer because the director of the school is a musician. Fortunat Strowski, who is always assiduously modern, although he is a member of the Institut, has just made a speech in which he suggests that the Conservatoire should concern itself with questions of scenery and lighting and should remember that the modern theatre is not entirely a matter of words but of psychological subtleties, indicated by gestures and facial expression, and of an atmosphere which is largely created by scenery and lighting.

He is opposed by others—and I confess that I am among the number—who say that the only part of the actor's art which can definitely be taught is its technical side—clear speaking, properly balance and dignified movement, the elements of gesture and facial expression; that the Conservatoire is right to concentrate on these things; that the merely technical side of scenery and lighting is fairly soon learned, and is in any case more the business of the stage producer than the actor, and that all the rest is a matter partly of actual stage experience, partly of inspiration, partly of personality, and cannot really be taught at all. Besides, as far as scenery and lighting are concerned, is not their contribution to the success of any play often exaggerated? In going through the successes of last season Lucien Dubech can only find two in which the setting really counted for anything at all, and, even then, not for much. In every other case the public went to see the play and the actors.

The teachers and the pupils of the Conservatoire are not the only people who are accused of lacking seriousness. The other day Emile Mas, of all critics the most devoted and enthusiastic student of the Comédie-Française and its répertoire, took two of the younger sociétaires, Marie Bell and Madeleine Renaud, severely to task for the careless and almost contemptuous way in which they had interpreted their parts in a revival of "Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr," by the elder Dumas. The defense of the two actresses was taken up by Pierre Brisson, the young dramatic critic of the Temps, where his father long held the same post. In the course of his defense he advanced the surprising theory that the play was not really very important, and that to act it well it was indispensable for the actors to be convinced of that fact.

This naturally gave Emile Mas an opening for the enunciation of the principle which Lucien Dubech finds illustrated in the dramatic successes of the year. The book of the words, he says, is not—as some German and especially some Russian producers seem to believe—merely a peg on which to hang an interpretation sometimes directly in conflict with the intention of the authors, as Meyerhold treats the work even of such an author as Gogol. Its artistic merit is for critics to appraise, but actors can only interpret it well if they take it seriously. In support of this opinion, Emile Mas quoted the reply which Frédéric Febvre, a distinguished sociétaire of the Française, gave to a journalist who asked what he thought of the new play, then in rehearsal: "I think it is a masterpiece, and any actor who is going to do justice to an author is bound to have the same opinion about any play in which he appears."

PHILIP CARR.

THE NEW SHOWS

THROUGH THE NIGHT—Tomorrow night at the Theatre Masque. Helen MacKellar is chief player in this piece, which is the work of Samuel Ruskin Golding and Paul Dickey, a pair of veteran playwrights who have not previously joined hands. The players will also include John Westley, Noel Tearle and George MacQuarrie.

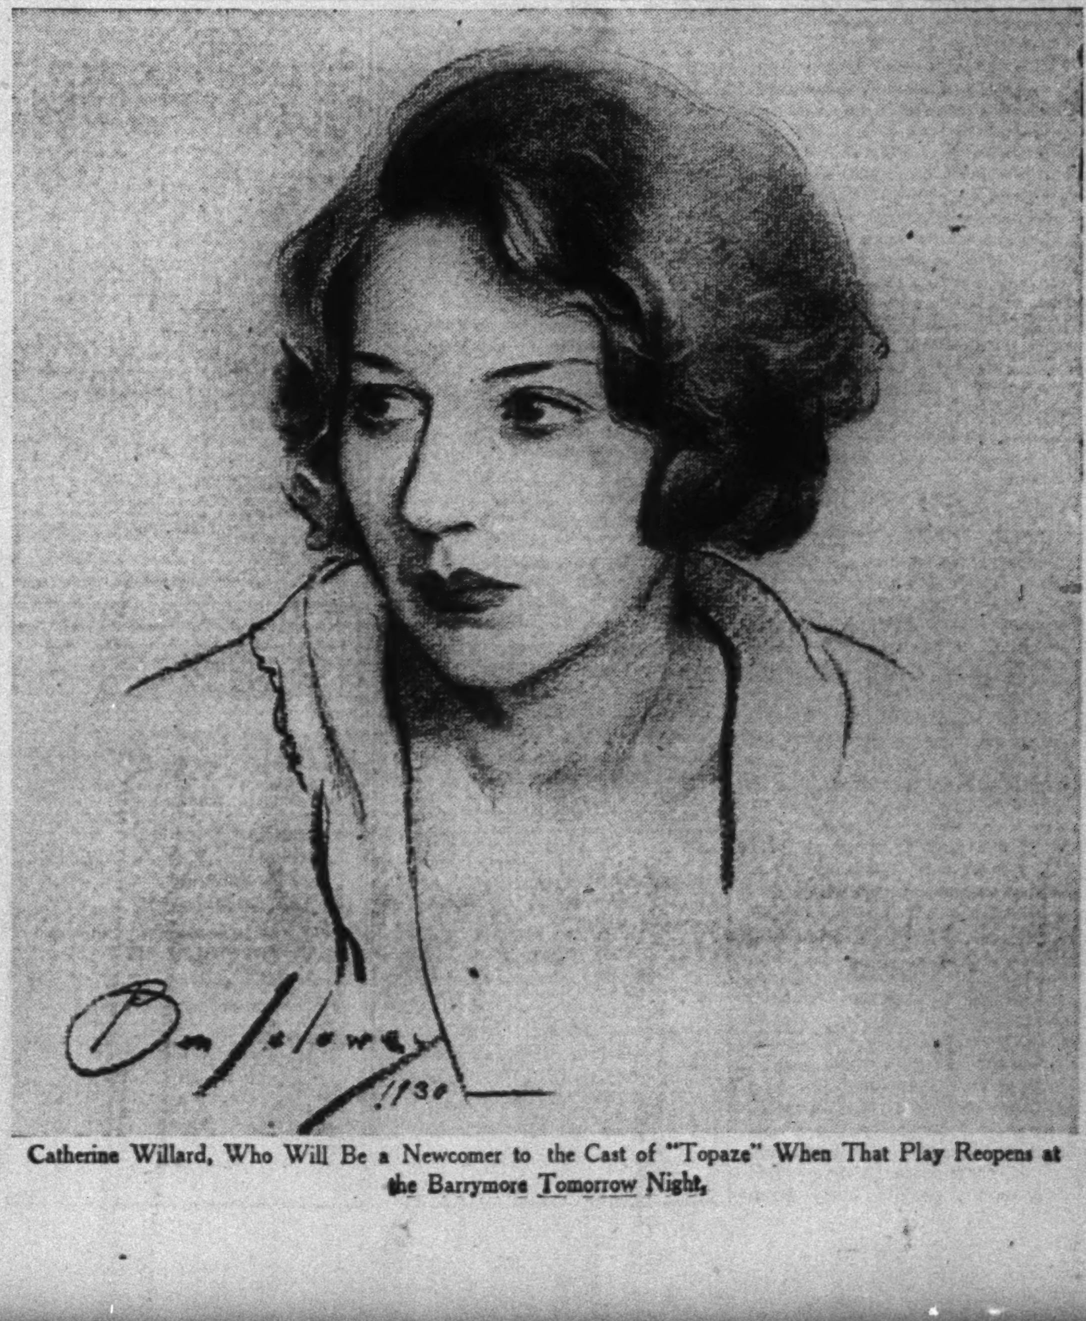
HOT RHYTHM—Tuesday night at the Times Square Theatre. That wandering showman, Will Morrissey, is behind this venture. It is a Negro revue, and it is said to be related to the revue that Mr. Morrissey put on down in Greenwich Village in the Spring, although that wasn't a Negro revue at all. Doubtless this can be figured out.

REOPENING

TOPAZE—Tomorrow night at the Ethel Barrymore Theatre. M. Pagnol's comedy again, with Catherine Willard as the woman this time, and Frank Morgan again as the school teacher.

LOST SHEEP—Tomorrow night at the Selwyn Theatre. The return of one of the Spring entrants.

YOUNG SINNERS—Tomorrow night at the Shubert Theatre. One of last season's sturdy stayers, back for a brief visit before taking to the road.



Catherine Willard, Who Will Be a Newcomer to the Cast of "Topaze" When That Play Reopens at the Barrymore Tomorrow Night.

THE SEASON'S EARLY BOOKINGS

Listing the First Occupants of Those Playhouses That Have Made Up Their Minds, and Perhaps a Few That Haven't—All in All, It Will Be Business as Usual

NOT counting a handful of minor playhouses, there are close to seventy-five regular theatres in this town. Fifteen or thereabouts are already occupied, in most cases by productions that will hold their places at least part way into the new season. A wandering reporter has been canvassing the other sixty during the past few days, trying to find out just what is to be expected of the early part of the season.

In some cases, of course, they don't know, for there are still more playhouses than there are prospective plays. But in a lot of cases it was possible to find out pretty definitely, and in others to do a bit of pretty safe guessing. The list that follows is a composite of definite announcement, guarded confidences bestowed under a misapprehension, and permissible guesswork. So these, unless all signs fail, are the shows that the following houses will start off the season with, regardless of how they may wind up:

Dancing Partner	Aug. 5

Last two weeks.

ALVIN—The Messrs. Aarons & Freedley will have a Gershwin musical show called "Girl Crazy," which will eventually open either here or at the Broadhurst. This is the piece that was going to have Bert Lahr in it—until a court decided that Mr. Lahr could stay where he was.

AMBASSADOR—"Symphony in Two Flats," Sept. 15. This is a comedy by Ivor Novello, who seems to be as all-round a fellow as Noel Coward. Anyhow, Mr. Novello not only wrote it but will also act in it, and for good measure he promises to give a piano recital some time during the run. Tie that. . . . Also in the cast will be Lilian Braithwaite, last seen here with Master Coward in "The Vortex."

BARRYMORE—"Scarlet Sister Mary," Oct. 13. Miss Barrymore herself will be the star, and the tale runs that Miss Barrymore's daughter will make her stage début in this play—surely an auspicious occasion. As those who have read the novel need hardly be told, Miss Barrymore's rôle will be that of a Negress.

BAYES—They were planning to put a Continental musical piece called "Die Wunder Bar" in this house, but that called for the services of George Jessel, and now it's said that Mr. Jessel may go elsewhere. So who knows?

FULTON—"That's the Woman," Sept. 1. Bayard Veiller is the author, and it is said to be another court room play, but vastly different from "Mary Dugan." The story is that it's good, too.

MARTIN BECK—"Green Grow the Lilacs," Oct. 27. A play by Lynn Riggs, a young poet from Oklahoma, who is also the author of "Borned in Texas," which Mr. Hopkins plans to produce. The scene of "Green Grow the Lilacs" is the Oklahoma of many years ago, and in it the ballads of the period will be sung.

BIJOU—"Everybody Welcome," Sept. 1. It used to be called "Let's Get Married," and that sounds as though it were a comedy. Roger Pryor will be in it, and so will Albert Hackett, who is by way of being one of the authors.

BILTMORE—"The Up and Up," Sept. 1. It is a play about the underworld, and Dorothy Stickney and Donald MacDonald will be in it. It is the work of those two girls who wrote "Subway Express."

BROADHURST—"Girl Crazy," if it doesn't go to the Alvin.

EARL CARROLL—One of Mr. Carroll's revues, of course, and just as soon as they build the theatre.

CHANIN'S 46TH STREET—"Hello, Paris," Oct. 6. A musical show with Chic Sale in it.

CIVIC REPERTORY—Miss Le Gallienne will start another season on Sept. 29.

COMEDY—The Actor-Managers will take possession of this house. They will offer a season of classical plays.

CORT—"Symphony and Jazz," early in September. The producer is Mr. Cohan, who semioccasionally turns to a play not his own, and the author is Louis K. Anspacher, who has been reasonably quiescent since "The Unchastened Woman." Louis Calhern, who was on tour with Miss Barrymore all of last season, will have the chief rôle.

CRAIG—Probably a musical show called "Wells of Romance," along about Sept. 22. The important thing about it is that the book and lyrics have been written by the same Mr. Sturges who turned out "Strictly Dishonorable."

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S—Jane Cowl, presenting "When Hell Froze" on Oct. 14 and "Twelfth Night" a week later. Leon Quartermaine, who was so excellent in "Journey's End" last year, will be prominent in Miss Cowl's company.

ELTINGE—"The 9th Guest," Aug. 25, which is only a week away. Owen Davis made it over from a novel, and it is concerned with eight people who are locked in a room and doomed to die. The visitor of the title, one ventures, is Death.

EMPIRE—Probably "Step-Daughters of War," due about the third week of September. It will be Chester Erskin's first production of the season, and Katherine Alexander will have the principal rôle.

ERLANGER'S—"Fine and Dandy," the Joe Cook show, Sept. 15. The book is by Donald Ogden Stewart, and Mr. Cook will be revealed as a young man who is required to take over a factory—specifically, the Fordyce Drop Forge and Tool Company. For good measure, the music and lyrics are the work of Kay Swift and Paul James, who wrote the Wanamaker ditty in "The Garrick Gaieties."

FORTY-NINTH STREET—"Insult," Sept. 9. It is a play by a Dutchman and the scene is the Dutch East Indies, although the play arrives via England and will be acted by an English cast.

FORREST—"On the Spot," Oct. 20. One of Edgar Wallace's most successful melodramas. Surely you know Mr. Wallace.

JOHN GOLDEN—Any one of Mr. Golden's impending plays—either the Frank Craven play, "That's Gratitude"; the Geoffrey Kerr play, "Ring Three Times," or the Donald Meek play, "After Tomorrow."

GUILD—"Elizabeth the Queen," Oct. 13. Maxwell Anderson's play about Elizabeth and Essex. Miss Fontanne and Mr. Lunt will have the rôles.

HAMMERSTEIN'S—"Luana," Sept. 16. "The Bird of Paradise" in musical form, and they say it certainly is Hawaiian.

SAM H. HARRIS—"The Greeks Had a Word for It," Sept. 15. A play by Zoë Akins, not represented here in several seasons. Muriel Kirkland, late of "Strictly Dishonorable," in the chief rôle.

CHARLES HOPKINS—"Mrs. Moonlight," Sept. 29. A play from England, and with Haidee Wright, Edith Barrett and Guy Standing in its cast.

IMPERIAL—"Princess Charming," Sept. 29. A Hungarian musical comedy done over by Englishmen for London production and now remade by Jack Donahue for Broadway. That's the way things go.

LONGACRE—"The Long Road," Sept. 8. It is a play by Hugh Stange, dealing with the war or a phase thereof, and Otto Kruger will have the principal rôle.

MAJESTIC—"Nina Rosa," Sept. 22. A musical show that has already been out on the road a year.

MASQUE—"The Man in Possession," Sept. 29. It is a London success at the moment and will be played here by a London cast. Leslie Banks, who played here last season in "The Infinite Shoeblack," will have the principal part.

HENRY MILLER'S—"One, Two, Three," Sept. 29. It is a short play by Mr. Molnar and will accordingly be preceded by a still shorter play by Mr. Molnar. In the chief play of the evening Arthur Byron will be the leading actor.

MOROSCO—"Mr. Gilhooley," Sept. 30. Jed Harris's first production of the year will be a dramatization of the O'Flaherty novel, with Helen Hayes and Arthur Sinclair as its chief players. Miss Hayes hardly requires identification; Mr. Sinclair came here several times with the Irish Players and always to an accompaniment of plaudits.

MUSIC BOX—"Once in a Lifetime," Sept. 22. A play about things in Hollywood, with Jean Dixon, Blanche Ring and Hugh O'Connell in its chief parts.

NATIONAL—The return for a few weeks only of "Uncle Vanya," Sept. 22.

PLYMOUTH—"Torch Song," Aug. 27. Mr. Hopkins's first production of the season and the work of Kenyon Nicholson. Night club and Salvation Army background, with Mayo Methot as the heroine.

RITZ—"Café," week of Aug. 25. The entire action takes place in a Parisian sidewalk café.

ROYALE—"The Second Little Show," Aug. 26. It opened last Monday night in Boston, and they say it's likely to be good.

ZIEGFELD—"Tom, Dick and Harry"—but when? Mr. Ziegfeld is due home tomorrow, and if he starts right in there should be a November opening. Three stars for this one—Marilyn Miller and the two Astaires.

ANOTHER RIALTO

CHICAGO, Aug. 13.

THERE is nothing worth saying this week except that "Love Technique," which opened at the Studebaker a week ago with Lou Tellegen as its star, is a sexy satire upon the polygamous habits of mummers like Lou Tellegen.

The schedule of openings here to date is as follows:

Mae West in "Sex," Garrick, Aug. 24.

"The House of Fear," Playhouse, Aug. 24.

"Lost Sheep," Selwyn, Aug. 30.

"Young Sinners," Apollo, Aug. 31.

"The Last Mile," Harris, Sept. 1.

"Artists and Models" (final date after three postponements), Grand Opera House, Sept. 8.

"The Apple Cart," Theatre Guild season, Blackstone, Oct. 6.

"The Girl in the News," Dramatic League season, Princess, Oct. 6.

"The Firebrand," Goodman Repertory season, Oct. 14.

This leaves the Illinois, the Erlanger, the Adelphi, the Cort, the Great Northern, the Majestic and the Civic (Fritz Leiber) unheard from.

GRIFFITH AND HIS WORK

The "Old Master" Recalls Amusing Things From the Past and Talks of Plans

EULOGIZED by the more avid as the "Old Master" of the films, by others as a "lyricist in an age of realism," and by still others as the "father of our modern technique," David Wark Griffith at 50 refuses to have requiems said over his work and stands, physically a tall, gaunt, easy-speaking man, choosing to be known and called a "good fellow" rather than one to whom the picture business owes any debt.

At the Astor Hotel recently where he had encamped for a period until his first talking picture, "Abraham Lincoln," will be exhibited at the Central Theatre on Aug. 25, he showed signs of slight worriment, however. Possibly the fear that the rush of younger men armored with new devices for recording the voice, with tricks to paint the screen in many colors and hundreds of other schemes to make pictures what they weren't in Griffith's time harassed the veteran director.

At any rate his conversation flowed from reminiscences of the time he gave Lionel Barrymore the munificent sum of $5 a day, to his future plans, which included ideas for the filming of an "epic" on the Texas plains.

Griffith gives one the feeling of a "debunker." He may be the father of that which the Russians call montage, and Eisenstein may have admitted his debt to the American, but the director of "The Birth of a Nation" doesn't even know how to pronounce montage and has seen only one of the Soviet worker's films, "Potemkin." "Yes," he says in a noncommittal fashion. "I liked 'Potemkin.' And that is all.

Once when Lenin was foremost in Russia's affairs he offered Griffith a position with the Soviet making propaganda films.

"But," Mr. Griffith said, "when I heard Russian spoken for the first time I decided not to go."

This may or may not have been the reason, but the comment is typical of the Griffith mind. He didn't want his name changed to "Griffithsky," he said. It is his dry humor that wins his friends and his apparent disregard for the seriousness of any such thing as "motion pictures in the guise of a great art." He admits frankly that he is still in love with picture making and would rather do it than anything else, but also, and in the same breath, he views its money-making possibilities and then philosophizes whimsically on the advantages of a swollen monetary larder.

Griffith likes talking films and accepts them completely. He believes that there are few, "very few," he added quickly, who can still make a silent film and succeed. One of these is Chaplin. He sees little need for remaking versions of his early successes, because people would not want to see new stars in the place of the old favorites. He mentioned only "Judith of Bethulia" as suitable for an audible revival because of its excellent dialogue, having been adapted from the Bible.

"Judith of Bethulia," incidentally, was his first four-reeler and it was in his succeeding films that he introduced the close-up, mist photography, the flash-back, the fade-out and other devices. When the close-up was first shown, the audience rose to its feet shouting, and demanded to be shown the feet of the actors. The close-up was difficult to accomplish because the camera man on the set refused to photograph an object when the background was not visible and out of focus in the frame. The first camera man had to be discharged and another hired in order to proceed with the picture.

His "Lincoln."

His new picture, "Abraham Lincoln," is said to have more sets than any previous talking picture and more speaking parts for the central character, and, if that is not enough to recommend it, Mr. Griffith emphasizes the nature of Lincoln. He is portrayed by Walter Huston and made, by Mr. Griffith, to be a man, rather than the historical martyr and sculptured emancipator.

"He is a man," according to the director, "who wrestled and fought and loved and lived like any other being, and we have tried to imbue the character with just that spirit. Lincoln suffered many vicissitudes after Ann Rutledge's death. We have incorporated all of this in our film."

Stephen Vincent Benet wrote the scenario after Griffith had written it first. The latter wasn't quite satisfied with his own work, and when he read "John Brown's Body," the Benet poem, he decided that the writer was the man. So he came East and induced him to return to California to work on the film.

Some of the more amusing highlights in the Griffith career include the time when he was at dinner with George Bernard Shaw, Sir James M. Barrie and Winston Churchill in England. Mr. Shaw let it be known, according to newspaper accounts and Mr. Griffith's description of the affair, that he would like to write a scenario for pictures. Mr. Shaw's offers at the time were more and more pressing until Griffith was forced to the point of refusing him point blank. Later Shaw remarked, when questioned by a reporter, that he had not only offered to write one scenario for D. W. Griffith but to write forty or fifty of them and "on the spot."

Asked of his future plans, Griffith sat back in his chair and drawled: "Well, I'd like to get this film out of the way and then go off for a long rest. Play golf. Swim!"

Then he lit up another of the chain of cigarettes he smokes and continued in the same voice:

"But I'd like to get hold of Steve Benet and do something on this here story of Sam Houston that I * * *."

NOTES OF THE VIENNA SCREEN

By JOHN MacCORMAC.

VIENNA.

ONE of the most difficult fields for the sale of American talking films is Southeastern Europe, with its seventy million inhabitants speaking ten different languages. Of the eight countries which compose it, the inhabitants of four can understand German, though for political reasons not all of them are willing to admit it, and those of two could follow sound films in French, but English audible screen offerings are a mystery to all with the exception of Austria.

If there was any general demand for the advent of the dialogue film it was not from this part of the world, to whose polyglot population the silent film was a blessing, and none the less so because it came from Hollywood. Its disappearance has been a deprivation. That the talking pictures have not been an entirely adequate substitute so far as the public is concerned is indicated by the fact that Belgrade cinema owners recently served notice on film distributers that they could not accept dialogue films in English, since their audiences could not follow them. Neither has the talking film been an unmixed blessing to the owners of the picture houses. They brought sudden prosperity to the first Vienna theatres in a position to show them and are still a paying proposition for the larger houses and the chain theatres which could afford the installation of good American reproducing systems and had the seating capacity to make them pay. For the smaller owners they have been a catastrophe, as may be judged from the fact that in Vienna alone a hundred of the small cinemas have been closed or are on the point of closing.

In a last, despairing effort to insure a supply of that almost vanished product—the silent film—the Association of Vienna Moving Picture Theatres and the League of Small and Medium Cinema Owners have united to form an organization which shall undertake importation and distribution, since renters and distributers have themselves lost interest in anything but talkies. In the resolution authorizing this action some very hard things were said about the audible pictures, which were described merely as a device to enable the American electrical trusts to snatch the profitable film industry from the hands of those who had initiated it.

"Since there are still cinemas in Belgium, Germany, Denmark, England, Holland, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Finland and other countries as well as Austria which need silent films," said President Weiler of the League of Small and Medium Cinema Owners, "it should be possible to have them supplied. I insist that silent films still have a future."

Another result of the change over to sound has been to destroy the local film producing industry. Even in the days of the silent or, as the Germans say, the "dumb" films, this had not been in a very flourishing condition, being kept alive only by a "kontingent" or foreign-film quota. The fact that Vienna is still an important theatre centre and possesses one of the world's best opera stages might seem to give it some claim to suitability as a production centre for talkies, especially of the operetta and revue types which seem to be the style for the moment. But the great technical and financial demands of sound-film production are beyond the knowledge and the purse of Austria.

A "LITTLE SHOW" TRIES OUT

A TRADITION calls Boston a good town for that sort of thing, and to that city's Wilbur Theatre last Monday went "The Second Little Show," assembled by Brady & Wiman, in association with Tom Weatherly, to see if the wonder could be repeated. Viewed at its première by more attention callers than ever saw its predecessor try-out last year in Atlantic City (whence the scouts came home with erring, doleful reports), the second edition again offers music mostly by Arthur Schwartz and lyrics mostly by Howard Dietz, and in general is small and informal. "A valiant effort . . . to keep to the spirit of the original entertainment," The Boston Evening Transcript calls it, admitting, though, that here and there it is just a little more pretentious. That, of course, is at once excused on the ground that the revue is by way of becoming an institution, and hence claims a certain dignity. Until Aug. 26, at the Royale Theatre, when this town will have opportunity to judge for itself, The Transcript report may serve as follows:

"In pattern it is not unlike the first of the series. There is an amusing first scene in which New York is presumed to have seceded from the Union to the relief of the rest of the country. In it, Al Trahan, who is the chief of the comics, delivers an uproarious stump speech as the president of the new republic and Joe Lewis, who is not far behind him in buffoonery, mounts guard as the sentry at the border, uniformed in Irish green but boasting a rich Hebraic accent.

"There must be boudoir black-outs as Ned Wever frankly admits (he is something of a master of ceremonies) so three of them are tossed together, all set at once on the stage. They are less the smoking room brand of humor than burlesques of the genre. For variety the young men of the chorus do a song and dance of their own in long-tailed evening coats, or the lively Ruth Tester and the elongated Davey Jones turn in a song and antic dance like 'I Like Your Face,' or Gloria Grafton in something of the manner of Libby Holman takes a hand at moaning blues.

"Before the first act is over Mr. Trahan, with his former vaudeville partner, Miss Yukona Cameron, to assist him, puts on an act that is a show in itself. . . . It lasts for approximately half an hour, and is typical variety stuff, much of it, indeed, material worked over from his two-a-day turns.

"So it goes with ups and downs as is the way with the musical reviews. There are take-offs on the practices of passport photographers, on the methods by which columnists wring the material for their paragraphs from unwilling victims, on the speakeasies, on the 'lonely hearts,' on the Russian plays with their characters of yard-long names. There are songs and dances galore, prettily conceived and cleverly done—'I Started on a Shoestring,' for example, or Miss Helen Gray's and Mr. Wever's 'Practicing Up On You,' or Miss Gray's musical monologue of 'The Clock at the Astor.' Not all of it is of a piece. Not all of it, presumably, will remain when the labors of preparation are finished. But even as it is it provides a full measure of rich fun, and for the future it promises even better."

¶ Wm. A. Brady, Jr., and Dwight Deere Wiman, in association with Tom Weatherly, announce the opening of THE SECOND LITTLE SHOW, a new edition of the aristocrat of all revues, at the ROYALE THEATRE on Tuesday evening, August twenty-sixth. Mail Orders Now. Address Brady and Wiman, 137 W. 48th St. Prices: Opening night, Orchestra $11, Mezzanine $5.50, Balcony $4.40, $3.00, $2.00, including Tax. Tickets thereafter $1 to $4.40. Matinees Thursday and Saturday.

PICTURE PLAYS IN THE OFFING

LEON ERROL will make his début in a full-length talking picture in "Social Errors," which Paramount is now making. It is from a story by Owen Davis, with adaptation by Percy Heath and Sam Mintz. Richard Arlen and Mary Brian are in the cast, as is Stuart Erwin.

Ian Keith will play the rôle created by Basil Rathbone on the stage in "The Command to Love" when the motion picture version, known as "The Boudoir Diplomat," will be screened. Others in the cast will include Betty Compson, Mary Duncan, Jeannette Loff and Lionel Belmore.

Some will be glad to learn that George Bancroft has embarked on another story, this time a sea yarn under the direction of Rowland V. Lee, who directed the muscular one in "Ladies Love Brutes." In the new story, by William Slavens McNutt and Grover Jones, Mr. Bancroft plays the part of a ship's captain. A review of "Ladies Love Brutes," in The London Daily Telegraph, said that "the plot of the film is credible only because the action passes in a country where crime appears to be regarded more or less as a recognized industry."

Ruth Chatterton will have a dual rôle in her next production, "The Right to Love." She will be seen and heard as both mother and daughter in this film based on Susan Glaspell's book, "Brook Evans." "The Right To Love" will be Richard Wallace's first directorial assignment since his recent return from a world tour. He directed "The Shopworn Angel."

Detroit, the city of automobiles, will be featured in a production which Dudley Nichols wrote for Fox. It is titled "F. O. B. Detroit." Benjamin Stoloff, recently relieved after his duties in directing such madwags as Ted Healy and his gang in "Soup to Nuts," will direct the Nichols story.

Research experts at the First National and Vitaphone Studios have found that musical comedy pictures formed 38 per cent of that company's output during the past season. An additional 16 per cent of the pictures had what is known as "incidental music." The experts discovered also that the melody in these pictures was responsible for 25 per cent of the total production cost.

Paul Lukas will play the leading rôle in "Ladies' Man," the film originally scheduled for William Powell from the pen of Rupert Hughes. Mr. Lukas has appeared in more than sixteen pictures during the past few years.

Clever Acting Makes "Queen High" a Merry Film—Other Pictorial Offerings

By MORDAUNT HALL.

FRANK MORGAN and Charles Ruggles afforded many an hour of delight to audiences by their excellent performances in "Queen High," a vocalized film of the musical comedy of the same name and of Edward H. Peple's play, "A Pair of Sixes." It is a happy-go-lucky sort of film with periodical outburst of song for which there is little or no excuse. The proof of the pudding, as some wise person once said, is in the eating, and the proof of the value of this picture was in the laughter it created.

"Queen High" is a farce that is well constructed and if the ending is a trifle feeble one does not feel in the least annoyed. Just to watch Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles going through the funny incidents was ample reward for having sought admission to the Paramount. It is to be hoped that both these clever actors will be seen in other pictures and one is impelled to look forward to seeing them together in another comedy. It is one thing to witness the work of such players and quite another to gaze upon the rowdy antics of the average screen comic with no stage experience.

Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles are aided and abetted in this comic offering by Ginger Rogers, an actress who can boast of real individuality, and Stanley Smith, who contrives to be sympathetic in a juvenile part. But the burden of the fun rests upon the shoulders of Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles, who appear respectively as George Nettleton and T. Boggs Johns, partners in the feminine garter business. This line of merchandise paves the way for several attractive girls to appear from time to time during the various scenes.

Like Potash and Perlmutter, Nettleton and Johns discover that being partners in business leads to many heated arguments and petty jealousies. Johns engages his nephew, played by Mr. Smith, to work in the office, and Nettleton infuriates Johns by employing his niece, played by Miss Rogers, to do what little she is able to in the stenographic line. Nettleton believes that he is doing the lion's share of the business and Johns thinks otherwise. Judging by the beginning of this film these two have been having it hot and heavy for years. In an early chapter Cyrus Vanderholt appears upon the scene, hoping to change snarls into smiles. Finding, however, that this is beyond his powers of persuasion, Vanderholt, a legal luminary, comes forth with a suggestion, which, while it by no means causes the partners to like each other any the more, at least serves to stir up plenty of amusement. It is that the partners draw a poker hand of cards and the one who is topped is to serve as butler for the other.

This gives an opportunity, of which full advantage is taken by both players and the director, Fred Newmeyer, to make several humorous situations. Nettleton and Johns are more than slightly nervous as they draw cards.

According to the signed contract, the one whose cards are beaten must not only agree to serve the other as a menial but he must obey every whim of his temporary employer for the matter of a year. If the loser transgresses he is to pay $100 for the first offense and in the agreement the penalties increase about as fast as they do with lost tricks at contract bridge when a player is vulnerable. Supposing the butler decides that he can't stand the gaff, then he must forfeit the sum of $10,000.

When the first five cards are dealt, it is a matter of drawing others. Nettleton has but a pair of sixes and Johns holds only queen high. They do not improve their cards, and through turning the camera from one man to the other one appreciates Nettleton's agony, for he presumes that no matter what his partner has he must have better than a pair of sixes. Johns on the other hand as he slowly uncovers the corners of the cards realizes that the next year of his life is to be spent in servitude for the pompous and to his mind inefficient Nettleton. Pain and joy are later expressed on the respective countenances of the partners.

Johns is soon seen garbed as a butler in Nettleton's comfortable home. Mr. Nettleton, being somewhat of a martinet at the moment, informs Johns, who as a butler is called Boggs, that he must wear sideburns. A refusal and Boggs is fined $100, Nettleton having his notebook ready to make such entries. Nettleton sees to it that the young woman who has consented to become Mrs. Johns is one of the guests at his house, and she is therefore waited upon by her prospective husband.

Nettleton does all that can be done to teach Johns a lesson. It seems as though his slave is going to have rough going for the ensuing months, when Polly Rockwell, Nettleton's niece, in her eagerness to patch up the differences between the partners, tells Johns that he can soon end his uncomfortable existence by pretending to be an admirer of Mrs. Nettleton. Johns sees the light and forthwith begins to put Nettleton in a state of suspicion and jealousy. Perhaps Nettleton might have forced Johns to serve out the full year, in vengeance for Johns's everlasting show of fondness, but Johns puts an end to such a thought one day by asking his "master" if it will be possible for him to sign on as butler for a second year. This is too much for Mr. Nettleton, who calls upon Vanderholt to give his opinion concerning the canceling of the contract.

Mr. Newmeyer, who guided the destinies of several of Harold Lloyd's best silent films, has done splendid work in his direction of this merry affair.

"Blushing Brides."

THERE has been at the Capitol for two weeks a film called "Our Blushing Brides." It is one of those shop-girl stories intended, obviously, to widen the eyes of its living prototypes. Except for one or two comedy episodes, it is so fatuous that one almost expects adult spectators to shout their pain and annoyance. The dialogue is as inept as anything that has been written for the screen and the incidents are just about as silly.

There is the department store where the girls are employed. Then there is the villain, who during the day superintends a band of shoplifters and now and again makes appointments with the girls at the counter. There is also the Long Island estate where the famous fashion show is held and, latterly, there are the two disappointed feminine creatures and the one girl who keeps to the straight and narrow path.

This picture, does, however, contain some handsome scenes, which are worthy of a more intelligent type of story.

Jocose Joe Cook.

JOE COOK'S cinematic translation of "Rain or Shine" is a jovial affair, the story of which, it is is to be presumed, pokes fun at circus melodramas. Mr. Cook constantly reveals his sense of humor as well as his ability as an equilibrist. He handles the patter of his part with no loss of time and accompanies the verbal deliveries with the necessary expressions. He is, however, at his best when he is standing on a sphere and turning it with his feet up an incline, also when he is testing his skill as a slack-rope artist and when he manipulates the Indian clubs.

There are several good bits of comedy in this picture, and one of the outstanding stretches is where lions are being fed with palatable but far from satisfying morsels, such as chickens and dishes of lamb. Once they take a supposed gorilla by surprise and make him speak, which seems unexpected to the "animal" as well as to those on the screen who hear him. Even some spectators in the Globe, where this picture continues for another week, imagined that this monster was a real jungle beast.

Schmeling as an Actor.

MAX SCHMELING, the heavyweight pugilistic champion, thanks to a foul from Jack Sharkey, is officiating as the prizefighting hero of a German part-dialogue film called "Liebe Im Ring" ("Love in the Ring"), which is still holding forth at the Eighth Street Playhouse. Herr Schmeling, taking all things into consideration, gives a fairly good account of himself, and while he does not cover himself with any great glory, he at least succeeds in avoiding any tempation to over-act while he is appearing opposite experienced performers. And there are several clever players in this film, which is mostly without speech, but with sound. There is Kurt Gerron, who makes the most of any part allotted to him and in this case does capital work as Max Masse's (Herr Schmeling's) manager. Geron is a weighty specimen of humanity and not very tall. The mobility of his features is marvelous. He can impress one with his anxiety or joy with a naturalness that is very welcome. Then there is Olga Tschechowa's performance as the enchantress. Fräulein Tschechowa is the prettiest siren who has ever graced the screen. She does not affect any sinister glare, although she lowers her long-lashed eyelids to lure Max away from Hilde, his humble fish-market sweetheart.

As in all such prizefighting films, there is the chapter in which the hero is permitted to emerge victorious after his sowing of wild oats. Max has his big show with José Santa, the Portuguese heavyweight, who looks big enough to toss Schmeling out of the ring. This fight, however, is a kid-gloved affair in more ways than one, for both contestants appear to be somewhat reluctant to strike each other with any great force. Max is supposed to be able to fight all the more fiercely because of the sudden knowledge that the siren is a lady of many lovers. She, as it happens, is not vexed with Max, and when he is declared the conqueror she forthwith sends up a large bouquet of flowers, which Max after a look at the siren and then a kindlier look at his real sweetheart (who also occupies a ringside seat), promptly hands to his still half-conscious opponent.

The detail work and the atmospheric flashes in this film enhance its interest. Then there are certain humorous episodes, which, while they might be unconsciously funny, strike one as scenes which any director would expect to be greeted with laughter. Certainly there is nothing to take seriously about the sight of the bulky Schmeling being purred at by the beauteous Olga Tschechowa. It is also really funny to observe Max's old parents sighing because he does not turn up at the humble meal they have prepared for him, especially as there are a few close-ups of the sugar-coated cake on which is inscribed "Dem Sieger." After a flash of the doleful family, including the fair Hilde, the camera is turned to the apartment of the siren, where Max appears to be in a daze as the temptress treats him as another "fool there was," hoiding his hand and showing her white teeth as she looks at his scarred, low-browed countenance out of half-closed eyes.

At the end of this film, which was produced more than a year ago, Schmeling signifies his intention of coming to America to try his luck in the squared ring.

The sound reproduction, both vocal and incidental, is never very good in this screen offering, which, however, in spite of its story frailties, succeeds in being above the average in entertainment.

LATEST FILM OFFERINGS

RUTH CHATTERTON and Clive Brook are to be seen in "Anybody's Woman" at the New York and Brooklyn Paramount. This film is based on a story by Gouveneur Morris and was directed by Dorothy Arzner. Miss Chatterton plays the rôle of a burlesque chorus girl who meets a lawyer who defends her on a misdemeanor charge. Later, the lawyer, under the influence of liquor, marries the chorus girl. There follows the ostracism of the lawyer, played by Mr. Brook, from his social set.

THE Capitol is showing William Haines in "Way Out West," in which Polly Moran, Leila Hyams and Cliff Edwards are seen in support of the wise-cracking player. As a circus barker trying to "con" the local cowboys out of a few hard-earned pennies, Mr. Haines is caught and allowed to work out his losses on a ranch, where he meets the beautiful girl.

THE Warners' Strand is offering "Dancing Sweeties," a comedy drama of today's youth based on the novel by Harry Fried. This picture has something to do with girls and dance halls. Sue Carol has the leading rôle opposite Grant Withers, and Edna Murphy, Tully Marshall and Kate Price are in the supporting cast.

GEORGE ARLISS'S film, "Old English," will have its première at the Warners' Theatre on Thursday evening. Mr. Arliss appears in the rôle of Heythorp, an octogenarian. All the scenes are laid in Liverpool in the Victorian period. The story concerns old Heythorp's determination to coerce the directors of his company into taking over his friend Pillin's ships, whereby he will insure the safety of his grandchildren. The players in this photo-adaptation of the John Galsworthy play are Ivan Simpson, Leon Janney, Doris Lloyd, Betty Lawford and Harrington Reynolds.

"ANIMAL CRACKERS," the screen version of the play in which the Four Marx Brothers were seen, will be on view at the Rialto Theatre on Thursday. In this production the Marx brothers—Harpo, Chico, Groucho and Beppo—confuse matters concerning the robbery of a valuable painting from a wealthy matron's home. Lillian Roth is also in this production.

THE French version of "The Big Pond" is at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse with Maurice Chevalier and Claudette Colbert retaining the parts they played in the English production.

CINEMA NOTES

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS in his next film will be a Douglas Fairbanks in modern dress, for in "Reaching for the Moon," his next photoplay, in which Bebe Daniels is to appear in the leading feminine rôle, he will be seen in the raiment of 1930. It is also announced that, in the same way that Lillian Gish would not be seen any longer chasing canaries about the bush, the athletic star would no longer be viewed as the vaulting Robin Hood or the gay d'Artagnan, a bolt from the blue for many who have enjoyed seeing him falling up a flight of stairs or swimming those leagues under the sea.

Edmund Goulding, lately the supervisor of "The Devil's Holiday," will direct the film, which William Anthony McGuire will write. This also is to be Irving Berlin's first film production.

"Molinoff" is to be Charles Rogers's next film which Lloyd Corrigan and Morman McLeon will direct. In this film Mr. Rogers will play the rôle of a young American who goes broke in London. Frances Dee, the young woman who was lifted from the ranks of an extra to play a leading feminine rôle in the Chevalier film, "Playboy of Paris," will appear opposite Mr. Rogers. Stuart Erwin, William Austin and Leo White are in the supporting cast.

Kay Francis, who has been doing rather well by herself in talking pictures, will next appear in William De Mille's "The Passion Flower,"

LONDON FILM NOTES

Alfred Hitchcock's New Talker, "Murder," Wins High Praise From British Critics

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

LIKE Lord Byron in a previous epoch, Alfred Hitchcock awoke the other morning to find himself the talk of the town. He was already more or less famous in the cinematograph world. He was one of the young hopes of the English film producing industry. "Blackmail," which he directed, was a record of achievement. It was, a year ago, described by British critics as "the greatest talking film made"; and it was incidentally mentioned by those same critics, not without complacency, that it was "all English, you know." Then for a time but little was heard of Mr. Hitchcock. It was known that he was hard at work in the Elstree Studios, but his production was slow, and some impatient minds suggested that he found difficulty in repeating the success of "Blackmail." In fact, it was even whispered that the new work which Mr. Hitchcock had taken in hand—the screening of a mystery murder story by Miss Clemence Dane, published under the title of "Enter Sir John"—was proving too difficult and that Mr. Hitchcock himself was losing patience.

These and similar reports have now been shown to be baseless. Miss Dane's story has been filmed with an ability which most of the people who have a claim to express an opinion pronounce to be nothing less than genius. Indeed one well-known critic now proclaims Mr. Hitchcock to be "probably the greatest living film genius"; and another declares that his new production "definitely places him on a level with the world's greatest film directors—Lubitsch and Eisenstein, the Russian." (One wonders why no American names are cited in this category. This chronicle, however, is concerned only with the British appreciation of the work of a Britisher.)

Hitchcock's Start.

Mr. Hitchcock is, by all accounts, a modest man. He is also young—just 30. At 15 years of age he began to work for an American cable company. A year later he boldly went to the London head of the Paramount organization and informed him that the captions on the Paramount films were "rotten." The young man—the youth, rather—was given a job at writing captions that were not "rotten." He developed new ideas, and in course of time came to be engaged by British International Pictures as a director at a salary which was colossal in English eyes. "Blackmail," and then "Juno and the Paycock" followed; and now comes Mr. Hitchcock's newest "triumph." Miss Dane's story has been given a new title. "Enter Sir John" might have meant anything or nothing. As "Murder" it has the merit of clarity. People who go to see it will at least know what they think they are going to see. Whether they will be quite as clear in their impressions when they come away after seeing it may be another matter. In fact, to some intelligences the title may seem to be altogether a misnomer. "Low-brows" may even suspect that Mr. Hitchcock is a "high-brow" who is trying to poke fun at them.

A Dual Feat.

The combined acuity of perception of Hollywood will, of course, at once realize that Mr. Hitchcock has essayed the double feat of presenting a story that grips and making a satire that gently stirs the critical faculty. The general public is informed that this picture "seems to have taken as its model the mass of back-stage and underworld drama produced in the last two years in Hollywood and as its aim the raising of such drama to a point at which it ceases to be an intellectual offense." Hollywood has been burlesqued very effectively on the screen, by itself as well as by outsiders. Will the general public appreciate the satirical interest of this British gesture of disdain for methods which have succeeded so well from a box-office point of view?

Picture Highly Praised.

Extraordinary praise is lavished upon Mr. Hitchcock's innovations in the matter of screen technique. "Murder" is said to "carry the sound film further into the future than any previous production." Who but Mr. Hitchcock, it is asked, would think of introducing a flash of a glass of stout, flanked by a hunk of bread and a piece of cheese, at the moment when a prosperous play-producer is inviting a needy actor to lunch? Again, Mr. Hitchcock's hero is shaving himself while he is thinking of a young woman who has just been condemned to death. The producer wants to convey to his audience some idea of the procession of thoughts passing through the man's mind as he draws the razor over his chin. How does he accomplish this? By giving a flash-back in the mirror? No, that is for Mr. Hitchcock an old and of course discredited method. Instead of a flash-back, there comes from a wireless set in the room the strains of an orchestra playing the "Liebestod" from "Tristan." It is this sort of effect which Mr. Hitchcock's enthusiastic admirers acclaim as the mark of his transcendent genius.

And yet again Mr. Hitchcock conveys the impression that his hero is a poverty-stricken actor by making a carpet wave under his feet as he enters a rich manager's office. You see if the poor fellow were accustomed to wealth of surroundings he would never notice that the carpet was luxuriously soft and thick—it wouldn't rise up and strike his consciousness.

Can this be the line of ultimate development of the technique of the screen? Miss Clemence Dane, the authoress of "Enter Sir John," left the scenario writing of "Murder" to other hands—those of either Miss Helen Simpson or Miss Alma Reville, of whom the latter is Mr. Hitchcock's wife—because she was otherwise occupied in writing three plays for Miss Sybil Thorndike and finishing a novel. But her views about the audible screen are peculiarly interesting. "I believe in the talking pictures for my own special reasons," she told an interviewer. "They will eventually bring back poetic verse to the stage because audible films and the wireless are educating the public to think with their ears and listen with their eyes."

"New Art" of Cinema.

Hollywood, of course, may deride such sentiment as "piffle." That public for which Hollywood caters may hold a similar opinion. But British International Pictures appears to have faith in the combined genius of Miss Clemence Dane and Mr. Alfred Hitchcock and doubtless mutters: "Damn the public, anyhow!" It will be a month or more before the public is given the opportunity to register its verdict as to this specimen of the "new art" of cinematography.

Mr. Herbert Marshall, an English actor well known to American theatregoers, scores a great success as Sir John Menier, the amateur detective who has to race against time to discover the true murderer and free the woman whom he, as one of a jury of twelve good men and true, had virtually condemned to death. The heroine is Miss Norah Baring. She has few opportunities to reveal her talents, of which Elstree directors think so highly that she is given some rôle or other in almost every film produced there. "Murder" certainly does not err on the side of excessive "sex appeal," and for this reason, as well as for some others, some proportion of cinema enthusiasts will presumably consider the production slow.

HOLLYWOOD HAPPENINGS

Ramon Novarro as a Director Encounters Novel Experiences—Plays and Players

HOLLYWOOD, Cal.

THE Hollywood studios are in a constant state of reajustment to suit changing needs, and one of the most important and far-reaching of the new requirements is the making of talking pictures in foreign languages. Small groups of foreign actors are being assembled in various studios and many of the already established players with linguistic accomplishments are extending their borders by working in two or three languages. One of the most interesting twists of the new ordering is putting Ramon Novarro in the position of director for the first time. Mr. Novarro is taking to his new work with surprising alacrity. He sits all day at a desk, a very unromantic desk in a bare little office, and interviews endless applicants for positions in the picture he is about to put through its paces. Having just finished "The Singer of Seville"—its title is being changed to the lurid and laborious "Call of the Flesh," quite against Mr. Novarro's wishes—M-G-M has decided to film this story of a young opera singer who through failure finds success in the star's native tongue. As a finale in the picture Mr. Novarro sings the famous "Ridi Pagliacci." At another point in the picture he dances a Spanish number with René Adorée that again recalls the famous tango that Valentino did with such aplomb in "The Four Horsemen."

Many amusing incidents come to pass during a session as director, and Ramon Novarro has had his good share in getting ready for the big event of taking a picture into his own hands for the first time and handling it as if it were one of the musical numbers that he stages in his own private theatre. As the whole affair is being carried through in Spanish, he will enjoy comparative immunity from the official studio interference and supervision that so often wreck the artistic intent of a director. It will be well worth a critic's time to look up the Spanish replica that he is about to conjure forth and to compare it with the English version, for there may be some valuable lessons to be drawn from the comparison. Handling Spanish and Mexican players is not altogether a simple matter, since they are extraordinarily touchy as to rank and perquisites. They are all stars. One applicant, a well-known player in Spain, was quite willing to play second to Mr. Novarro, provided that Mr. Novarro agree to take a secondary rôle to the Spanish actor in some future film. It was tactfully explained that existing contracts with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer precluded any such pleasant possibility. So, perhaps, Mr. Novarro's initial adventure in directing may be the first and also the last, since one man cannot be expected to be all things in the complicated game of making motion pictures. Other ambitious picture stars have found this out to their cost. The new Novarro film should be a riot in the Latin countries.

An Excellent Team.

Until the coming of the sound screen, Mr. Novarro was perhaps the only actor on the M-G-M lot to possess qualifications for artistic acclaim in other departments of the arts. Now he has as next-door neighbors such sterling artists as Lawrence Tibbett and Grace Moore, both of whom are being starred in a version of "The New Moon." Here there should be high romantic accomplishment with vocal frills aplenty, as both these grand opera stars are eminently qualified for spirited dramatic action and glamorous appearance before the cameras. Mr. Tibbett is something of an old hand at the camera game, with his "The Rogue Song" behind him, but Miss Moore is in the throes of picking her way about the intricate maze of hawk-eyed cameras and sleuth-like microphones. With only two days off since arriving in Hollywood, she has rushed from one scene to another, with hardly time for meals, what with all the singing lessons and rehearsals and getting up new lines and music. But she admits that being on the crest of one's own wave is rather thrilling, after all, and now, with "Jenny Lind" behind her, "The New Moon" in the making, and a spectacular version of "The Merry Widow" to follow in short order, there won't be much chance to play around in Hollywood before she dashes off to fulfill her European contracts for the coming season. M-G-M is anxiously casting about for a successor to John Gilbert in the Prince Danilo rôle, and I should think it a rather difficult task not only to find some one to equal his performance in that silent picture, but to partner Miss Moore with a singing actor of equal calibre.

Edgar Selwyn has his hands full directing a bevy of fair maids through Becky Gardiner's adaptation of "War Nurse." It was difficult to recognize familiar faces in the group of veiled ladies sitting about the Selwyn set, the Alice-blue—used for purely photographic purposes—of their uniforms and head-pieces making them look like part of a Ziegfeld version of a wartime hospital staff. Za-Su Pitts was there, her large plaintive eyes and expressive hands making her identity easier than in the case of Hedda Hopper, whose usual garb is the last word from the smartest Paris houses. The shooting was all being done behind screens the morning I chanced by, being one of those episodes when good war nurses get together, I suppose. Not even Robert Montgomery was around, so it must have been part of the picture when the leading man is taboo as well. Open house prevailed on the "Three French Girls" set, however, and it was comforting to find Fifi Dorsay being married in white and not robin's egg blue, even if it was hard on the camera man. With Reginald Denny and George Grossmith and Cliff Edwards romping through a farcical French wedding, and with an assorted group of French extras for devoted peasantry, the microphones were busy catching the latest Wodehouse bon-mots. Burton Holmes is another notable on the M-G-M roster, as he is being initiated in the art of monologuing his travel pictures for the biggest audience he ever entertained.

Out in a corner of the big M-G-M lot is a little corner where two bona-fide Africans are domiciled. Mutia and Riano by name, brought to Hollywood by W. S. Van Dyke to insure the proper color for any retakes that the long-awaited "Trader Horn" film may need. They play characters in this colorful conception of African river life, and are the oddest note to be found in this extraordinary community where it is possible to find at least one of most everything under the sun. It's a pity that their Swahili vocabulary is limited to some 200 words, else they could put down their Hollywood impressions in as interesting form as Mr. Van Dyke has done in his African diary, which, by all accounts, is filled with enough vivid material (gathered on the longest and most arduous picture hike on record) to warrant publishing.

It's an ill wind that doesn't change somebody's luck, and the switch-about that has come to so many stars of the older order owing to enforced dialogue on the screen now finds Vilma Banky, Samuel Goldwyn's dazzling blonde importation from Budapest, about to step forth before the footlights on Broadway. With her equally well-known husband, Rod La Rocque, she will be starred this Autumn by Arch Selwyn in the new comedy that Anita Loos and John Emerson have written about Hungarian amours. The part should suit Miss Banky, and the accent, which has proved to be a stumbling-block on the screen, should serve her well in the theatre. This will be Miss Banky's first appearance on any stage, as she has never been seen in her own country except on the screen. She is at the moment en route for Paris and Budapest on a flying visit for clothes and a brief family reunion, her second time in Hungary since Mr. Goldwyn brought her to America to star with Ronald Colman. NOTES OF THE BERLIN SCREEN

New German Regulations Meet With a Storm of Disapproval—Ufa's Plans for Autumn

By C. HOOPER TRASK.

BERLIN.

THE new German regulations concerning the importation of foreign films into Germany have met with a storm of disapproval. Instead of being milder, as one might have expected, they are considerably more severe than formerly. Although 230 full-length features may be imported, less than half of these, 110, can be talkers. As no good silents are being produced anywhere in the world today, this makes 120 of the permits practically illusory. The American producers contend that the sound quota will come nowhere near fulfilling their needs, especially as a certain proportion of the foreign films imported will be of French and English origin. Moreover, these 110 permits are left very much in the hands of the Department of the Interior. Forty are to be allotted to the renting firms on the basis of the number of German pictures which they distributed within the last two seasons. Twenty will be assigned to companies which have sold German pictures for distribution in foreign countries (but these will not be available before Jan. 1, 1931). The final 50 are left entirely at the disposal of the Minister of the Interior, who can distribute them as he desires. The American producing firms are particularly annoyed at this, because it leaves their status so indefinite, everything depending on the last minute decision of a politician.

But not only the Americans are protesting. Dissatisfaction is also expressed by the German firms who had made arrangements with British or French companies to produce jointly. That scheme consists of making a talker in Paris or London with a German version, for which the Germans foot the bill, and later a different picture in Berlin with an English or French version, for which the foreign capitalists pay their share. But the new regulations are very strict in defining what constitutes a German talker. It specifies that:

(a) The producers must be a German company.

(b) The interiors and exteriors, except where the story makes unavoidable demands, must be taken in Germany.

(c) The scenario and music must be written by Germans.

(d) The director must be German.

(e) The majority of the actors must be German citizens.

This would, of course, greatly hinder these cooperative arrangements which tend to make for internationalism in the industry. That the Minister of the Interior has promised to treat such pictures with especial consideration does not help matters much, as, in any case, they would use up permits needed for other films.

Although no official statements have been made, it is generally known that the American industry is not willing to accept the new regulations in their present form. I have it on good authority that the most important American producers, who also control the key theatres in America, have issued an ultimatum to the German producers that, unless they bring pressure to bear to have the regulations revised, German pictures will be boycotted in America next season. At any rate, even though the patent quarrel has been settled amicably and talkers recorded on German equipment may now be shown in America, most of the local firms have canceled their plans for English versions. And, unless the Germans have some hope of selling a feature to the English-speaking countries, they dare not produce anything of a spectacular nature, as they would then have no chance of getting their investment back. But just as in the patent situation some satisfactory compromise is sure to be reached sooner or later, for the good of the patron of the talker it cannot come quickly enough.

Ufa's Fall Program.

THE Ufa is starting its Fall program early. In the latter part of July it brought out at the Ufa Palast a talker which promises to run into the Winter. This is "Der Schuss im Tonfilm Atelier" ("The Shot in the Talker Studio"). Kurt Siodmak's idea of setting a mystery plot in a talker studio was an artful one. Audiences like to look behind the scenes and there is always something fascinating about machinery. The system of taking dialogue pictures is still shrouded in mystery and the elaborate electrical equipment has something almost supernatural about it.

So the director, Alfred Zeisler, merely had to turn out competent workmanship—the high bare brick walls, the weird looking lighting equipment, the microphones hung at strange angles, the camera enclosed in a huge box with a glass front did the rest. The story, which suffices to keep things moving, concerns the murder of a film actress. At the very moment when she is supposedly shot in a scene, she is actually killed by a revolver bullet. The male and female stars of the picture within the picture are both suspected, as they have been playing in the shot with her and have each had a revolver in their hands.

The featured players are Gerda Maurus and Harry Frank. The latter is a competent-enough leading man with a rich musical voice, but Miss Maurus is a left-over from the days when Fritz Lang, who was responsible for "Nibelungen" and "Metropolis," had much to say in Ufa affairs. I am not enthusiastic about her.

STARS AND THEIR NEW PICTURES

INA CLAIRE will arrive in New York this week for work in "The Royal Family," the George Kaufman-Edna Ferber play, which will be filmed at the Paramount New York studio. During the past season Miss Claire has been appearing on the Los Angeles stage. George Cukor and Cyril Gardner will co-direct the film and Frederic March, having completed his role opposite Nancy Carroll in "Laughter" at the Eastern studio, will have the leading male rôle.

Warner Baxter and Edmund Lowe will be teamed again in "The Cisco Kid." This will be the first time these players have been brought together in a film since "In Old Arizona." John Ford, who is now directing "Up the River," will produce "The Cisco Kid."

Before returning to New York this Fall, where he will appear in a play under the direction of Arthur Hopkins, Walter Huston will act in another film, in which Dolores Del Rio will have the leading feminine rôle. Willard Mack has written the story, the title as yet unannounced, and Thornton Freeland will direct it.

Universal has acquired two new authors for its scenario department. The first is Faith Baldwin, who wrote "Office Wife," and the other Dora Macy, author of "Ex-Mistress." Mary Lawlor will appear in a story to be written by Miss Baldwin.

MUSIC NEWS FROM ENGLAND, GERMANY AND RUSSIA

SIEGFRIED WAGNER

Shock of Mother's Death and Preparations For Baireuth Festival Hastened End

SIEGFRIED, last of the Wagner triumvirate, has joined his father and mother in Valhalla. Except for a few days directly after his birth and at his death, his place in the sun was obfuscated by the reflected glow and glare of the glory of his father, Richard the Great, and of his mother, Cosima, wife of the composer and daughter of Franz Liszt. Psychologists have shown the handicaps which more often than not rule out all but the strongest men who are lone children, who are younger brothers of strong-willed older sons, or who, most difficult of all, are sons of acclaimed geniuses. The adjective "acclaimed" is especially significant, since for a long time there has been much twaddle written about heredity and genius, whereas it is only just being realized that the handicap has hitherto not been so much the genius of a man's father as the fact that his eminence almost invariably forces the son into the background. Some day, it is to be hoped, a profound psychoanalyst will make a study of those cases where the father has died before his great gifts have been recognized and has thus allowed the inherent rights of his son to develop fairly. Only until such an exhaustive study has been made will the world be able to gauge the man and musician Siegfried Wagner, and hazard an opinion concerning his potential gifts and greatness and their possible development had they been permitted to grow unchecked. We have but to recall the somewhat pathetic banker, Abraham Mendelssohn, who was wont to repeat plaintively that first he was always simply the son of the distinguished philosopher Moses, and later merely the father of the eminent composer, Felix.

WHATEVER Siegfried was to the world at large, he meant very much indeed to his father, Richard, whose letters of the time are full of his new and great happiness. Wagner had married Cosima, daughter of Liszt, at Lucerne Aug. 25, 1870. Siegfried was born at Triebschen on June 6, 1869. In November, the year of his marriage, the composer wrote to Ferdinand Praeger: "My house, too, is full of children, the children of my wife's, but there also blooms for me a splendid son, strong and beautiful, whom I dare to call Siegfried Richard Wagner. Now think what I must feel that this at last has fallen to my share. I am [illegible] years old." A few weeks later he wrote again, "Richard, my son! Oh, what that says to me!" It is strange and paradoxical this, the paternal outburst of Richard Wagner, the arch-enemy of accepted codes of ethics, outdoing in emotion the humblest father unblest with any vestige of genius! To still another friend he wrote at this time: "She has borne me a wonderfully beautiful and vigorous boy, whom I could boldly call Siegfried. He is now growing, together with my work, and gives me a new, long life which has at last attained a meaning. Thus we get along without the world from which we have entirely retired." What his son's coming meant may partly be understood when we recall his renewed activities afterward.

DURING the month of November, 1870, Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyll," with the original title standing as the "Triebschener Idyll." It was the birthday gift by the composer to his wife. After a few rehearsals with Zurich musicians, and Hans Richter playing trumpet and viola, it was given early one morning at the top of the stairs of the Villa Triebschen. The composer conducted. His own poetic dedication read in part:

and later,

"So Siegfried hold, wie freundlich uns'rem Sohn,
Mit deiner Huld sei ihnen jetzt erschlossen,
Was sonst als tönend Glück wir still genossen."

The son was born while the music drama bearing his name was being composed. All the themes are drawn from it excepting the lovely oboe solo "Schlafe, Kindchen, Schlafe," the cradle song.

Now Richard loved Siegfried more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age; and he made him a tone-poem of many colors.

AS a fittingly romantic ending to the tale comes the report that the little house in Lucerne where Richard Wagner lived with Cosima, his wife, after their marriage in the church behind the Schweizerhof Hotel, has been bought by the city authorities, who plan to arrange the house both inside and out as nearly as possible as it was when the composer lived there and wrote some of his greatest masterpieces.

From this time on, all during his life, Siegfried was forced to appear in the eyes of the world as the son of Richard the Great. He studied drawing and mathematics for a short time, but returned to music. He composed more than a dozen operas and conducted his father's works without score. He came to this country to get funds to carry on, to bear out the words of his father: "My son will preserve my works to the world." He was a gifted stage director at Baireuth. But he never could be simply Siegfried Wagner. He was always to be Richard's son.

A week before this year's festival at Baireuth he fell ill. For the first time since the shrine founded by his father had given performances, no Wagner was present. Cosima, his mother, had joined Richard a few months ago.

What his thoughts were as he lay awaiting the end can only be conjectured. His last known wish was that the festival go on. Perhaps he recalled the lines of Goethe:

Des Menshen Seele
Gleicht dem Wasser:
Vom Himmel kommt es,
Zum Himmel steigt es,
Zur Erde musz es,
Ewig wechselnd.

Perhaps as he lay tired, there came to him Heine's stanza:

"Der Tod, das ist die kühle Nacht
Das Leben ist der schwüle Tag.
Es dunkelt schon, mich schläfert,
Der Tag hat mich müd' gemacht."

Edmund Waller's magical sestet,

"The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light through chinks that Time hath made:
Stronger by weakness, wiser men become
As they draw near to their eternal home.
Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view
That stand upon the threshold of the new,"

comes to mind.

Once more, when he had joined his father and mother, did he come into his own again. Of him it may truly be said that his life was dedicated to music and that he gave to it his best. Not many have earned such an epitaph. For the world of music, now that no one of the blood is left to carry on, the paramount question is, What will be the future of Baireuth?

IN deference to the wishes of Siegfried Wagner, the Baireuth administrative committee announces that the Baireuth Festival program will be carried on according to schedule. In a communiqué dated Aug. 5, which has just arrived on this side, the committee presents official details of "Siegfried Wagner's Illness."

"The son of the composer," says the communication in part, "became very ill on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 16th of July. He had experienced much difficulty in breathing some days before, though the illness seemed quite sudden to many people far from the scene. This impression was partly due to the fact that Siegfried Wagner refused to absent himself from the festival despite the attempts of his physicians to dissuade him. Toward 7 in the evening he collapsed with a severe and dangerous heart attack. His condition became so grave that he was immediately brought to the hospital in an automobile. The attending physicians succeeded in bringing the patient out of immediate danger by 11 o'clock that night and diagnosed his illness on the following morning as a muscular enlargement of the heart, complicated by very low blood pressure and swelling of the liver. In addition, catarrhal inflammation developed and the right lung became affected.

"There was no fever and the patient was fully conscious at all times until twelve hours before his death. From this time until the morning of Monday, Aug. 4, there were repeated consultations among the physicians. At 7 o'clock he ceased giving broken answers to appeals. His breath came with the greatest difficulty and he sank into the deepest coma. A few moments before his death his eyes opened wide, his gaze was fixed upward in the distance, his face became strikingly youthful, and the characteristic Siegfried Wagner expression in his features struck the beholder. He passed away at 5:30 on the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 4. He seemed spared of pain.

SIEGFRIED WAGNER had experienced difficulty in breathing some months before, beginning noticeably on July 16. He suffered a spiritual and physical collapse at the unexpected death of his mother, news of which he received while in Southern Switzerland. There is no doubt that the strain and excitement of the four weeks preceding this year's festival had its part in hastening his end. He labored during these four weeks from 7 in the morning until after midnight and for weeks slept very little. His time was further taken up with inevitable social duties.

"Medical art and the unflagging care of the attedants could not save the precious life, nor was the love of his wife of avail, who stayed near the bed of the patient from the first until the last moment.

"There is no doubt that Siegfried Wagner is a sacrifice to his devotion in seeing personally through every detail of the preparations of this year's festival."

The communiqué is signed by Dr. Hermann Koerber.

BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE.

The annual Bach festival in Leipzig was held a short time ago. The program included cantatas, chamber music, a cembalo concerto and the "Passion of St. John." Bach's own cembalo, one of the modern pianoforte's predecessors, is in the collection of musical instruments at the Berlin State Academy of Music. The Gewandhaus Choral Society, which is the choir of the Thomas Church, where Bach was organist and choirmaster for many years, took part in the program. The municipal orchestra, conducted by Karl Straube, present cantor of the Thomas Church, accompanied.

THE LONDON "PROMS" COMMENCE

THE B. B. C. (British Broadcasting Company) Orchestra, Sir Henry J. Wood conducting, recently opened the thirty-sixth season of Promenade concerts in Queen's Hall, London. This series of concerts extends over eight weeks, the final program being given on Saturday, Oct. 4. Prominent artists who will appear as soloists with the orchestra include Myra Hess, Harriet Cohen, the English Singers, Yelly d'Aranyi, Walter Widdop, Steuart Wilson, Harold Samuel, Isolde Menges, Marian Anderson, Elly Ney, Katharine Goodson, Maurice Marechal, Felix Salmond, Nicolas Orloff, Ethel Bartlett, Rae Robertson and others.

Following the custom of previous years, each concert of the week will be devoted to a particular type of program, thus: Wagner on Monday nights, miscellaneous program on Tuesdays, Bach or Brahms on Wednesdays, British composers on Thursdays, Beethoven on Fridays and popular programs on Saturday evenings, although such works as César Franck's symphony and Dvorak's "New World" are also included.

It is interesting to note the number of modern composers of various nationalities who appear on the Tuesday and Saturday miscellaneous programs. Ravel, on the opening night of the series, was represented by his "Bolero"; Hindemith, a few days later, by his concerto for organ and orchestra, Villa-Lobos's Choros for full orchestra being given on the same program. Other contemporaneous composers, not English, whose works are to be heard during the season of Prom concerts are: Aug. 19, Leos Janacek (Wallachian Dances for orchestra), Henri Rabaud (symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne"); Aug. 23, Dukas ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"), Percy Grainger (English Dance), Delius (violin concerto); Aug. 26, Ernst Krenek (potpourri for orchestra); Aug. 30, César Franck (symphony in D minor); Sept. 2, Charpentier (aria from "Louise"); Sibelius (tone poem, "Finlandia"); Sept. 9, Max Bruch ("The Fire Cross"), Honegger (concerto for violoncello and orchestra); Sept. 13, Ernest Bloch ("Schelomo"); Sept. 16, Kodály ("Summer Evening"); Sept. 20, César Franck (symphonic poem, symphonic variations for pianoforte and orchestra); Sept. 27, Kodály (suite, "Harry János"); Sept. 30, Arthur Shepherd ("Horizons"). Of the above list of composers three are Americans—Arthur Shepherd, native born; Ernest Bloch and Percy Grainger, naturalized citizens.

The following list includes world premières, also first performances in London and England, scheduled for presentation during the season:

Aug. 19—Wallachian Dances for orchestra ....Leos Janacek
Aug. 23—English Dance for orchestra and organ ....Percy Grainger
Aug. 26—Potpourri for orchestra (Op. 54) Ernst Krenek
Aug. 30—Suite, "The Land." Elizabeth Maconchy
Sept. 4—Anacreontic Ode ....Ethel Smyth
Sept. 9—Symphony for orchestra and organ ....Marcel Dupre
Sept. 9—Concerto for violoncello and orchestra ....Honegger
Sept. 16—"Summer Evening" ....Kodaly
Sept. 30—"Horizons" (four Western pieces) ....Arthur Shepherd
Oct. 2—Oboe concerto ....Eugene Goossens
Oct. 2—Pianoforte concerto ....John Ireland

Thursday evenings are given over to works by British composers mainly. As a basis for comparison with other countries, showing the opportunities afforded to native composers in England, the following programs may be of interest:

Aug. 14.

*Overture, "Portsmouth Point. William Walton
Benedictus from Mass in D....Ethel Smyth
Violin concerto in B minor....Elgar
Symphony No. 1, in E flat minor..Arnold Bax
Overture, "In Memoriam"....Sullivan
Pizzicati from "Sylvia"....Delibes
Slavonic Dance No. 1, in C ....Dvorak

Aug. 21.

Prelude, "The Kingdom"; aria, The Sun Goeth Down, from "The Kingdom"..Elgar
*Viola concerto ....William Walton
*Pastoral symphony ....Vaughan Williams
Symphonic rhapsody, "Mai Dun"....Ireland
Suite, "Mlada" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Prelude and ballet music from "Carmen" Bizet

Aug. 28.

Prelude to "Sappho"; song with orchestra, Daughter of Zeus, from "Sappho," Bantock
Concerto for violin and violoncello....Delius
A "London" symphony ..Vaughan Williams
Prelude, Act. II, from 'The Wreckers," Ethel Smyth
Overture, "Land of the Mountain and the Flood" ....Hamish MacCunn

Sept. 4.

Fugue in C minor for orchestra......Berners
*Anacreontic Ode for baritone and orchestra. Ethel Smyth
Violoncello concerto in E minor........Elgar
*The Rio Grande ....Constant Lambert
Variations on an Original Theme ("Enigma") ....Elgar
Overture to 'Macbeth"....Sullivan
Rythmic Dance ....Goossens

Sept. 11.

A Song Before Sunrise ....Delius
Song of Creation and the Faery Song, from "The Immortal Hour"....Rutland Boughton
*Symphonic Impression, Op. 8....Alan Bush
*Concerto for two pianofortes...Arthur Bliss
Symphony No. 1, in A flat....Elgar
Dance Rhapsody, No. 1....Delius
Puck's Minuet ....Herbert Howells
Clog Dance from "Handel in the Strand." Percy Grainger

Sept. 18.

Symphonic Poem, "Villon"..William Wallace
*Serenade for baritone and orchestra, Arthur Bliss
Symphonic Poem, "Falstaff"....Elgar
*Concerto for two violins; Ballet Music from "The Perfect Fool"....Holst
Symphonic Poem, "Lamia"..Dorothy Howell
Overture, "The Wasps"....Vaughan Williams

Sept. 25.

*"Enter Spring" ....Frank Bridge
*Sinfonia concertante for pianoforte and orchestra ....William Walton
Madrigals, Ballets, &c.
Symphony No. 3 ....Arnold Bax
Symphonic Fantasy, "Francesca da Rimini." Tchaikovsky
Danse Macabre, from "Dance of Death." Saint-Saens

Oct. 2.

Trumpet Voluntary ....Purcell
Oboe Concerto ....Eugene Goossens
Bright Is the Ring of Words; The Roadside Fire, from "Songs of Travel." Vaughan Williams
Pianoforte concerto ....John Ireland
Symphony No. 2 in E flat....Elgar
Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor...Handel
Overture, "Ruy Blas"....Mendelssohn
*Conducted by composer.

One hundred and eighty-two church choirs which brought together about 1,200 men and boys gave a concert recently at a festival in Albert Hall, London. Dr. Sydney H. Nicholson conducted. Evensong, Stanford's "Te Deum" in B flat and processional hymns and anthems were included on the program. In the procession were the Deans of Westminster and Windsor, and the Bishops of Winchester and London. The London Daily Mail arranged the event.

The National Union of School Orchestras of London gave a concert recently at the Crystal Palace, Allen Gill conducting. With an organ and the Grenadier Guards' Band, they played "admirably," according to The Daily Telegraph.

BERLIN'S NEW MUSIC FESTIVAL

By ALFRED EINSTEIN.

BERLIN, July 25, 1930.

LAST Sunday, in these columns, there was a review of some of the principal musical departures of the "new music" festival held recently in Berlin. It was then noted that special attention had been given to the problems presented by the "aural play" which was primarily conceived for broadcast purposes, chorus music for schools and for organizations of music-loving amateurs, and finally, the "teaching-piece," a sort of dramatic cantata for use in the higher schools.

School Opera.

The "Teaching Piece" culminates in the "School Opera." This school opera, "The One Who Says 'Yes'" (Der Jasager), was not given in the 'New Music—Berlin, 1930" weeks, because its authors, the poet Bert Brecht and the composer Kurt Weill, had some disagreement a short time before with the management of the festival. This, of course, hardly concerns us, since, in any event, the work rightfully belongs to the festival.

In this "school-opera," which has been included under the term "community music," a new territory has been won, and this, in turn, has been conquered. For the school-drama with choruses, the real school operas, are really old historical concepts, which have long been in existence. Since the time of humanism and the baroque of venerable history, especially in Germany, this form has drained and exhausted all the possible material of the classical and biblical, until the blessed nineteenth century also broke away from these dramatic and creative threads.

One may say "yes" as a whole to this "Yes Sayer," as little as one agrees with the component parts. Above all, one can harbor reservations about Brecht's text, which is, at bottom, an altogether too Japanese theatre piece. A small boy goes with his teacher and some schoolmates over the mountains in order to procure medicine and directions for treatment for his sick mother. His strength deserts him at a critical point during the quick return journey home. At this juncture the "great custom" of hurling the sick and weary into the abyss comes under consideration. The question whether it is not better to turn back is, according to the custom, always vetoed by the victim himself. The youth thereupon says "yes" bravely to his death and dies for the company. I am not so sure that it does not require the highest civil courage to say "no" in such a crisis. I do know that the comrades of the youth should not bring about his death. My middle-European conscience resists this concept. However, though the material in its motivation is weak and questionable, the situations are powerful. That which attracts youth in it is its absence of sentimentality and of mere empty words, its earnestness, its hardiness and its lack of pretension.

Creative Participation.

This time Kurt Weill the musician has greatly surpassed Bert Brecht the librettist. The work is his second big lucky hit after his "Dreigroschen-Oper." The music combines the assonance of the old classic with the modern "step-rhythm." The chorus at the beginning has in it Handelian solidity and weight, though without imitating Handel. The scene where the teacher introduces himself has the clang and rhythm of the saxophone. The dialogue terminates in a trio in which one can hear as much of the archaic as of the new. The scenes in the mountains are stylized not without naturalistic characteristics—that is, they are naturalistic not without evoking oratorio style in the change from solos to trios and choruses.

The action is connected by means of closely bound musical items. There is no recitative, but simply fashioned melody, motif-bound spoken song. It is all so simple in its total aspect, so premeditated in the facility of its entrances, that it sings of itself. The harmony, which is just as sure and simple, keeps clear of any suggestion of atonality and meanderings. All the orchestral passages sound rhythmic, primitive and yet quaintly in keeping with the tonal atmosphere, by means of the union of strongly garrisoned strings plus percussion and plucked instruments. The auditor cannot resist nor evade the sincerity or the style of the impression engendered by this music.

The best part of this work is the production. The anonymous "forces of the choir of youth," the singers and instrumentalists of the Academy for Churches and School Music, have given us an example of that "involuntariness" which is characteristic of the ideal of the art of play-acting. Here was an occasion where they were not acting in a theatre nor set up to be gazed at. Every participant, from the conductor down to percussion players, "made music," just as if there were no public present; from the diminutive Charles, who played the rôle of the boy—no, who was the boy—down to the trio of the chums, the figures were living and incarnate. Youth no longer needs opera; it has something different which is better. Or perhaps some day it may demand the best, because youth, the most critical portion of the public, insists upon genuineness, absolute truth in a work, and what might be called "second naïveté" in the artist.

Electrical Music.

In this German festival there were many more things to be heard, among others burlesque phonograph records by Hindemith and Toch, "phonograph music," so to speak—not an adaptation or a reproduction, but music conceived originally and directly with the phonograph in mind. This "production," however, bordered closely on practical joking. To be taken more seriously, however, was a new electrical instrument, the "Trautonium."

The evening was a series of compliments exchanged between host and guests. The director of the State Academy of Music, Georg Schuenemann, who gave us details in a smooth and meaty introduction concerning the activities of the "Radio-Research-Foundation," established two years ago in his institute, stressed the need of cooperation between musicians and technical engineers. He also introduced the lecturer, Friedrich Trautwein, inventor of the new electrical instrument, the "Trautonium," which looked down forbiddingly from the platform in various models within the box-like form of a radio-receiver.

As a harbinger of future scientific importance, Dr. Trautwein's invention seems more significant than as music. The instrument, while opening up many undreamed-of possibilities in the production and change of tone-color, has a long way to go, however, before it will be a musical instrument. It is operated very simply by the hand of the player, somewhat as in the Theremin instrument, where the right hand regulates the tones and the left the dynamics.

Dr. Trautwein selected one of the many "solutions," a "keyboard instrument." Here, however, the player had at his disposition a sort of stringed cylinder or flat, continuous manual with articulated points of contact, both the pitch and volume being regulated with one and the same finger. Chords and polyphonic passages are also conceivable, but such music was not given to us by the six performers on the platform, among whom were to be noted Paul Hindemith and Walter Goehr. The music played did not go beyond three-part polyphony on three separate instruments. A couple of compositions by Hindemith and Genzmers exhibited the powers of the new instruments and showed rich tone quality, tenderness, distant effects and rapid figuration. This last is what Theremin could not do, being always limited to cantabile. The tone, however, is piercing and impure, except for a few chords of magical quality. The figured passages come out unwieldy and in "amalgamation." "The Great Tone" is not genuinely round and full, but megaphonic and mammoth-like. It is an "unhuman" instrument. Is it really an enrichment for the "New Music" to stress the simplification of color when this very "new music" is returning, as it must, to humanity and human feelings?

GERMAN FESTIVALS.

THE following outline of current and future musical activities in Germany and Austria presents many important festivals, presentations and courses for visitors which are being offered in these countries this Summer and Autumn.

From Bach to Beethoven.

July-September—Augsburg. Chamber music in the old Golden Gallery of the Town Hall. Information: Verkehrsbuero, Rathaus, Augsburg.

Mozart Festival.

July-September—Stuttgart. Concerts in the courtyard of the old castle. Information: Stuttgarter Handelshof, Gewerbehalle Platz 1, Stuttgart; also, Rudolf Ritter, Wiederholdstrasse 22, Stuttgart.

Studeny Quartet.

July-September—Herrenchiemsee, Upper Bavaria. Chamber music and illumination of the castle. Information: H. Studeny, Tuerkenstrasse 97, Munich.

Berber Quartet.

July-September—Munich. Concerts in the courtyard of the residence. Information: Sueddeutsche Konzertdirektion Otto Bauer, Wurzerstrasse 16, Munich.

Strauss and Pfitzner Festivals.

End of August—Munich. Performances of "Rosenkavalier" (Strauss conducting) and "Palestrina" (Pfitzner conducting). Information: Amtliches Bayerisches Reisebuero, Promenadenplatz 16, Munich.

Havemann Quartet.

September—Coburg. Second Modern Chamber Music Festival. Information: Stadtverkehrsamt, Coburg.

Classical Music.

Sept. 3, 5, 7—Baden-Baden. Information: Staedtische Musikdirektion, Baden-Baden.

Music for Radio.

End of September—Munich. Conference. Information: Musikabteilung des Zentralinstituts fuer Erziehung und Unterricht, Potsdamer Strasse 120, Berlin W. 35.

German Conference on School Music.

Autumn—Cassel or Koenigsberg. Information: Musikabteilung des Zentralinstituts fuer Erziehung und Unterricht, Potsdamer Strasse 120, Berlin W. 35.

Annual Festival of Association of German Musicians and Music Teachers.

Oct. 2-6—Dresden. Lectures, opera, concerts, choral works, chamber music and sacred music. Conductors: Busch, Scheinpflug, Pembaur. Information: Reichsverband Deutscher Tonkuenstler und Musiklehrer, Zietenstrasse 27, Berlin W. 57.

German Bach Festival.

Oct. 2-6—Kiel. Under the direction of Dr. Fritz Stein. Information: Neue Bachgesellschaft, Nuernberger Strasse 56, Leipzig C 1; also Hafen- und Verkehrsamt, Kiel.

Bruckner Festival.

Oct. 22—Munich. Under the direction of Franz Schalk in connection with the meeting of the International Bruckner Society. Information: Amtliches Bayerisches Reisebuero, Promenadenplatz 16, Munich.

THE MOSCOW OLYMPIAD

ALTHOUGH the rôle of music in the big theatre Olympiad, held recently in Moscow and participated in by about 1,000 performers from all corners of the Soviet Union, was supposed to be a subordinate one, its effect grew rapidly with the development of the affair itself, writes Eugen Braudo in the Moskauer Rundschau. He continues as follows:

"There was hardly a theatrical performance without music. The art of music organized the dramatic action, it rhythmatized it, it gave it the ringing emotional background. Most of the theatrical performances given during the Olympiad were by no means purely dramatic art. In the national theatres it was always a matter of a musical-dramatic production.

"This powerful musical influence gave rise to an interesting contradiction. This contradiction may be labeled 'Ethnography or Active Art.' It's this way. The peoples who were freed politically and culturally by the November [1917] revolution have an almost passionate interest in their national music. This interest is developing along two basic lines. In the first place, the minority nationalities who, before the November revolution, were completely deprived of the right to a 'history,' just now are greatly attached to their musical historical development. This 'historism' is an absolutely necessary development among the national minorities. In the second place, almost all peoples yearn for the kind of music that mirrors revolutionary fact.

"This 'historism,' a hypertrophy of the ethnographically historical elements in the people's art, contains many dangers, the most important of which are an exaggerated nationalism and the cultivation of former court art. On the other hand, it takes much longer to learn the language of music than talking and reading. This deepens the differentiation of the values of musical feelings. It often happens that new words are linked with old melodies, as is the case with the Uzbeks, Tartars, et al. Nevertheless, the new texts also bring new dynamics into the musical presentation and explain the melodies. A new unity is born which exercises a particular influence upon the listener through a revolutionizing text.

"The musical part of the Olympiad opened a new world to the Moscow public. To most of the listeners the absolutely inexhaustible wealth of rhythmic forms, the powerful structure of the pieces drawn by the Eastern musicians from their very primitive instruments, came as a big surprise. For instance, some of the great Uzbek dances are built upon sixty rhythmic forms. Some of the peoples, like the Turkomans, have musicians of the highest virtuosity, a virtuosity unattainable by the most skillful players of Europe.

"The Olympiad was a most potent antidote for the deeply rooted prejudices regarding the music of the East. It showed that the melting chromatic, generally associated with the idea of the musical East, has nothing in common with the native art of the Eastern peoples. Of the hundreds of musical pieces presented during the Olympiad hardly ten were in line with the traditional conception of Eastern melody.

"Nevertheless, there is a real crisis in the people's art. The peoples of Central Asia, of the Caucasus, of the region of the steppes, are now experiencing a swift cultural reconstruction. The work of rearranging public life is being put through with feverish energy. Ethnographic art, old morals and customs, are being overhauled by life's tempo. The new ideas demand active, contemporaneous art. It is for the national artists to solve the serious problem of how to bring the traditional, national language of music into harmony with the new content. The Olympiad gave a quite definite answer. The new art uses a national language with an international content. This national language is based upon the actions of the people, upon the living, affirmative elements of the popular songs."

FOREIGN NOTES.

The Bergen symphony, which has been under private control since 1765, has celebrated its first decade under government supervision. Three festival concerts were given and music by every well-known Norwegian composer received a hearing. Harald Heide and Sverre Jordan conducted. Christian Sinding was presented with the Harmoniens Verdienstmedaille, which was struck originally in honor of the society's first conductor, Niels Haslund, the great grandfather of Edvard Grieg.

Three "pastoral fêtes of ancient music" were recently presented by Wanda Landowska with the assistance of pupils of her school at St. Leu-la-Forêt near the forest of Montmorency, France. Several concertos of Bach for two and three harpsichords were played and a cantata by Buxtehude, Bach and Tunder were sung, in addition to works seldom played by modern orchestras, of Frescobaldi, Handel, Couperin, Scarlatti and Rameau.

The festival is dedicated to music of the past and is given each year by Mme. Landowska.

Igor Markewitch's new cantata for soprano solo, male choir and orchestra, with words by Jean Cocteau, has been received warmly in Paris. The Russian composer, though only 18 years of age, writes "with astonishing mastery of technique in composition, and a sense of form remarkable in so youthful a musician."

Honegger's "Judith" with Lydia Wyrian has just been heard for the first time in Leningrad. Klimoff conducted.

THE DANCE: PHYSICAL TRAINING

Some of the Modern Creators Whose Systems Have Contributed Much to the Strength of the Movement as It Is Today

By JOHN MARTIN.

IN writing several years ago of the German dance as it appeared to him at the Congress in Essen, André Levinson, the distinguished Franco-Russian authority on classic dancing, remarked that he found a complete lack of recognition on the part of the German dancers of the two people who, in his opinion, were the real creators of the modern dance as it is now being practiced in Central Europe. These two people were Isadora Duncan and Emile Jaques-Dalcroze.

There is certainly much to be said in support of M. Levinson's statement indeed, except for her courage in attacking the classic ballet, Isadora Duncan finds little adulation in the German field, and Jaques-Dalcroze is rarely even so much as mentioned. But there is reason for believing that Levinson's view of the number of people who had important shares in the creation of the new dance is somewhat conservative. Undoubtedly Dalcroze and Duncan were the leading outside forces in the modernization of the ballet as it blossomed under the guiding hand of Diaghileff; but the case with Germany was not at all the same thing.

The Germans have been conspicuous for their lack of contribution to the classic ballet, and it is only natural that their new dance should receive its stimulus from quite different sources. It was, as a matter of fact, a rebellion against the musical basis of the eurythmics of Dalcroze and the "interpretations" of Duncan that gave Rudolf von Laban such a hold on the dance with his theories of movement and of musicless dancing. Indeed, so strong was the wave of anti-romanticism that swept across the scene in the years just after the war, when the new dance had its beginnings, that it is most profitable to search for its origins in fields not only far apart from music but even remote from any art connotations.

Two survivals of this early period bear witness to the truth of such a theory. One is the name "physical culture dancing," which was once the general designation for the whole movement, and which is gradually disappearing as the art aspects of the dance are made more and more important; and the other is the fact that physical technique, muscular control, balance, strength and such considerations are developed to a point so immeasurably beyond that of esthetic form and value. One must look elsewhere than to Duncan and Dalcroze, who were artists and adventurers in art, to find the sources of a movement which was, in a way, almost anti-artistic in its earliest stages.

CERTAINLY among the list of creators of the modern movement the name of Rudolf Bode must be included. His work as a physical culturist of the new school is known and honored throughout Central Europe, and his teachings have become in large measure part and parcel of the teachings of the dance studios, though he is not a dancer or a teacher of dancing. It is interesting to speculate on the situation of the modern dance if Bode's collaboration with Dalcroze had been established as he wanted it to be.

Before the great institute was built at Hellerau for Dalcroze he and Bode worked together, for a certain amount of physical training was recognized by Dalcroze as requisite for the best results of his method. He was zealous for the musical aspects of his eurythmics, however—perhaps more in those early days than he has since grown to be, what with the spread of his theories throughout educational fields in general and dance fields in particular, and he feared that too close an alliance with physical culture would divert the whole trend of his work into dancing. Hence the rupture with Bode and the consequent narrowing, one surmises, of Dalcroze's potentially great influence on the art of dancing.

Even without Bode, however, or some one to take his place, Dalcroze might have taken the leadership in the German dance but for the unfortunate consequences of his actions during the war. Though his school had been built in part by the city of Dresden and in part by private German capital, he was not, and could scarcely have been expected to be, a German himself in sympathies, background or tastes. But when he signed his name, as one of a number of artists, to a round-robin protesting against the sacking of Louvain, he committed a tactical blunder which sealed forever his fate as an influence in German art. His great enterprise at Hellerau had to be abandoned after only three years of activity, and he went to Switzerland to carry on under far less advantageous conditions.

CERTAINLY when one now visits the beautiful Dalcroze Institute in Hellerau—used in part as a training school for social workers, but with its most important part, the huge production hall, unused—one is moved to profound regret that an establishment so ideally conceived and executed should be allowed to lie practically idle as a monument to what might have been. Not only the dance but the theatre as well might easily have found a new birth here.

But even with the past as it unalterably is, the influences of Dalcroze are to be seen today in the German dance to some extent. For one thing, Mary Wigman was a graduate pupil of his school. Though she is not a passionate disciple of his method, she nevertheless could not possibly discard in its entirety an influence so strong.

For another thing, after Dalcroze left Germany the work was carried on for a time at the Hellerau school by some of his students and teachers, chiefly Christine Baer-Frissell, an American woman. Eventually she found it advisable to break away from the old surroundings, but under her direction there has occurred in a small way something of what might have taken place in a larger way if Bode had been admitted into the desired collaboration with Dalcroze. At any rate, in her Hellerau-Laxenburg school near Vienna, she has developed a training system for dancers which makes wide use of the principles of Dalcroze and which has had no small influence in the German field.

Throughout the rank and file of dancers, as well as in these special cases, there is to be seen a hint of the theory of eurythmics, though in a state of arrested development. The most elementary aspects of the subject have apparently been accepted as an end in themselves, and the musical condition of the whole dance is deplorable, partly in consequence of this. The relation of Dalcroze to the German dance is therefore a tragically unrealized one.

With the close of the war, the physical culture movement, quite apart from any consideration of dancing, leaped to unprecedented popularity. The interest of the nation apparently rose to extremes of devotion to health and hygiene. On the one hand, cults of doubtful value in the eyes of many sprang up here and there, advocating the wholesale discarding of clothes; on the other hand, the man in the street took to cross-country hiking, accompanied by his wife and family and their faithful walking-sticks.

IN the midst of this craze, it is not unnatural that a careful, one might almost say an inspired, system of corrective gymnastics like that of Dr. Bess Mensendieck (also an American woman), should have received the attention of the more thoughtful. To omit her name from those of the contributors to the German dance would be inadmissible, although she has never been in any way directly concerned with dancing and lays no claim to credit for having influenced its development. Her system, nevertheless, is included in more than one dancing school curriculum, and the highest tribute is paid to her name by many prominent dancers.

There have undoubtedly been other methods and other leaders who have also played a part in building up the tremendous background of physical training from which the dance emerges in high relief; for in the wide range of its activities there are to be found endless variations in theory and practice. Indeed, to underestimate this phase of the subject is to warp the perspective on the entire German dance, for it was primarily a physical thing.

In the transformation of this physical basis to an art basis, other names must be added to the list of "creators," which is already growing lengthy. This period included the relating of merely muscular movement to kinetic significance, and here is where the rank and file of the German dancers got decidedly off the track, so to speak. By attempting to associate movement with expression of some sort, they fell backward into the very pit from which they had just succeeded in extricating themselves, only this time they did not realize they were in it. We find much agitation over inner feeling and all the shibboleths of romanticism again in motion, the difference being that now feelings must be sinister, ugly, grotesque, in order to differentiate them from the sentimentalism of yesterday. If there has seemingly been something of a vicious circle here traversed, the end is not yet; and in the trend toward the theatre the modern dance is finding itself actually modern in the sense that modern music and modern painting are modern.

In that period when movement as muscle action was being experimented with as a possible medium for art, the great name was undoubtedly that of Laban. He not only paved the way for "expressionism" by his studies of movements in relation to character and mental qualities, but he also made certain highly important and fundamental analyses of space as the medium of the dancer. In view of the scope and timeliness of his work, it is little wonder that he is considered somewhat in the light of a father of the modern dance.

BUT Laban as an artist leaves room for complaint. He was merely the theorist. The artist who first put the elements of the German dance together in such manner as to create esthetic overtones was Mary Wigman, and though in point of time much was accomplished before she came on the scene, nevertheless, in listing the creators of the modern dance, her name must lead all the rest. For where they did the planning and provided the material, she supplied the magic spark that set their fuel ablaze.

Thus when one begins to account for the origins of the modern movement, such an army of originators marches into the accounting that one must needs withdraw in some dismay. Here, for example, much ground has been covered in point of time, but in point of space only Germany has been considered.

What about the modern dance movement in America? Has it been influenced by the physical culture movement? Have Laban and Wigman, Bode and Mensendieck helped to shape its course? Presumably not to any great extent, since none of the prominent American dancers has had any contact whatsoever with any of them. Yet, strangely enough, the prominent American dancers are with few exceptions creating an idiom which bears a strong relation to the idiom of the German dancers.

Does anybody actually merit the title of creator in a movement which spreads as this one does over so much unrelated territory? Or is there something in the air that all the creative dancers of the world happen to be breathing at the same time? Those who like to run down clues to their ultimate solution will no doubt choose to believe in personal creators; and for their edification and delight let it be said that there is an endless mass of material for them to work with.

GOLDMAN CONCERTS CLOSE

THE tenth and last week of the Goldman Band concerts under the direction of Edwin Franko Goldman will include an Irish-Scotch and several miscellaneous programs. The closing concert of the season will take place on the Mall in Central Park next Sunday evening, Aug. 24. The closing concert of the New York University series will be given on Saturday evening, Aug. 23. Soloists for the week will be Cora Frye, soprano, and Del Staigers, cornetist.

Complete programs for the week are as follows:

Aug. 18—Central Park.
Request Program.
March, "Kwang Hsu" (Chinese)......Lincke
Overture, "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Largo......Handel
Excerpts, "The Valkyrie"......Wagner
Excerpts, "Carmen"......Bizet
Fantasie, "The Student's Sweetheart."......Bellstedt
Del Staigers, Cornet Solo.
The Flight of the Bumble Bee......Rimsky-Korsakoff
March, "Sunapee"......Goldman
Excerpts from "Pinafore"......Sullivan

Aug. 19—New York University.

Two performances of opera will be given at the Convention Hall in Asbury Park, according to announcement made by the Cosmopolitan Opera Association. The operas are "Faust," to be given on Friday evening, and "Rigoletto" on Saturday, and singers engaged for these performances are Helene Adler, Alice Kurkjian and Maud Webber, sopranos; David Dorlini and Albert Deichler, tenors; Ciro De Ritis, Louis Dallemolle and R. Chan, baritones, and Alfredo Valenti, basso. Vito Mascato will conduct both productions and Bernard Cantor will be stage director.

The Steel Pier Grand Opera Company will present Thomas's "Mignon" this evening in the ballroom of the Steel Pier at Atlantic City. The opera will be sung in English, with the following cast: Elda Vettori, Melvena Passmore, Judson House, Henri Scott and Rhys-Rees Morgan.

The Free Open Air Grand Opera Company will present "Rigoletto" Thursday evening at the Starlight Stadium, East 177th Street. Mario Valle will sing the title rôle, Giuseppe Barsotti the part of the Duke.

W. A. Goldsworthy, organist and choirmaster of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, New York, will be the guest artist this afternoon at the seventh of the series of free concerts given under the auspices of the Westchester County Recreation Commission, at the Westchester County Centre, White Plains.

CHAUTAUQUA SEASON CLOSES.

CHAUTAUQUA'S second season of opera will come to a close with tomorrow evening's performance of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." The leading rôles will be sung by Milo Miloradovich and Charles Kullman, and the production is under the direction of Albert Stoessel.

SPIRITUALS AT STADIUM

ALBERT COATES concludes his three weeks' guest engagement with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this evening, at which time he will conduct an all-Russian program, consisting of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Glinka's overture, "Russian and Ludmilla," Stravinsky's suite, "Petrouschka," and Scriabin's "Poëme de L'Extase." For the two final weeks of the season the orchestra will again be under the direction of Willem van Hoogstraten, who returns tomorrow evening.

The Hall Johnson Negro Choir, conducted by Hall Johnson, will be heard Tuesday and Wednesday, marking the third successive Summer engagement of this group at the Lewisohn Stadium. Mr. Johnson has divided his program into two groups of four songs each: "Mos' Done Travelin'," "Deep River," "Great Camp Meetin'" and "Ol' Ark's a-Moverin'" during the first half of the program, and "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," "Water Boy" and "Gimme Yo' Han'" at the end. In addition to the program presented by the choir, the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. van Hoogstraten, will contribute works by Nicolai, Dukas, Berlioz and Strauss on Tuesday, and by Rossini, Grieg, Langley and Brahms on Wednesday.

First Stadium performances of the last week but one of the season, in addition to Langley's "Song of Youth," will be Bruckner's Eighth symphony in C minor on Thursday and three pieces for orchestra—Rhapsody Espagnole, Trianon and Scherzo Espagnole—by Charles Maduro, Saturday. Mr. Maduro was born and educated in Curaçao, Dutch West Indies, and his works have been played by the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic and the New York Chamber Music Society, as well as by prominent artists.

Anna Duncan will make her annual appearance at the Stadium in a program of dances next Monday and Tuesday, Aug. 25 and 26. Complete programs for the current week follow:

RECORDED MUSIC: 'A SONATA'

Thibaud and Cortot in a Masterly Version of the Caesar Franck Chamber Work—Other Recent Releases

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

ENGLISH H. M. V. is said to have some sort of a guiding principle reading to the effect that "when in doubt use the big three." Under this title have been placed Casals, Cortot and Thibaud. Apparently, Victor feels somewhat the same in the matter, for, with a few sensational and long-expected releases up its sleeve, we have Cortot and Thibaud figuring in a Masterpiece album (No. 81) for the second time in three months. They follow up the Kreutzer with César Franck's sonata in A, a replacement of an existing pre-electrical set, conveniently arranged so that each of the four records carries a full movement.

There is a method in this, for the album might easily have been overlooked had it been part of the larger monthly releases of the Fall and Winter, whereas at this time it is more than probable that the sonata will receive wider notice and more of us will make the acquaintance of what is probably the most typical of Franck's works.

This is another case in which one is tempted to take refuge in superlatives. Chamber music, as the mails disclose, is in a peculiar position. It is the only department to develop active enemies among gramophone owners, who have asked for light as to why the recording companies waste time with it when they have such wide unexplored fields for them. These four records form a more fitting answer than any we could devise. In the present form this sonata may be obtained in parts. It is suggested that any one honestly open to conviction obtain the second movement (allegro) by itself. When the inevitable charm commences to work, the fourth movement should be enough to settle the matter, and the remaining two are guaranteed to follow the others home, their tails high in the air. It will be in playing the complete set through that final conversion is bound to occur. Apart from the delights of the individual movements, Franck has achieved an extraordinary unity in his welding of the whole.

THERE has always been some question as to Cortot's recording tone. The microphone is not yet kind to the more subtle pianists, and the tub-thumpers are still able to score well above their merits. In this case, however, there are signs of justice. To those who test the set in the usual way—starting at the first side and throwing up their hands in despair before the work is under way—a warning might be given that the earlier parts of the first movement are not in any way a criterion of the remainder.

With the exception of Solvejg's song, one might win wagers on the identity of the parts of Grieg's Peer Gynt suite, No. 2. Yet with each hearing, the wonder at the greater popularity of the first suite increases. Commencing with the "Bridal Escort" covering the wedding feast and Peer Gynt's elopement with the bride, it covers the Arabian Dance of his travels, depicts his return and closes with Solvejg's well-known cradle song. The suite is now issued by Columbia on two records in the Masterworks series, without album. These are repressings from a set made in England about eighteen months ago by Georg Schneevoigt, sometime conductor at Helsingfors, and the New Queen's Hall Light Orchestra. The recording is, as usual from this source, very faithful. At times there are evidences of overamplification, but, in the main, the tone is excellent.

WITH its recording of samples of the work of last year's Schubert Memorial Contest winners, Victor is identifying itself with a worthy bit of missionary work. It may be remembered that the same opportunity to have specimens of their skill circulated to the world at large was given the successful entrants of the previous year. This time we have a recording from Phyllis Kraeuter ('cello) and Ruth Posselt (violin). Both young ladies keep the honors at home by selecting an accompanist from her own family.

Miss Posselt's choices (Victor 4184) are a "Poem" of Fibich (in Kubelik's arrangement) and Wieniawski's "Sielanka," Opus 12, No. 1, which between them manage to give her an opportunity for display in various lights. The "Poem" is an affair of the heart, with a touch of tragedy in it, during which Miss Posselt comes dangerously near to dropping sugared tears—but not quite. The reverse is something entirely different, a matter of acrobatics and fireworks calling for far sterner qualities. With an eye to the future, it is gratifying to note that the young lady gives a much better account of herself here than in the simpler and more sentimental piece.

Neither of Miss Kraeuter's contributions (Victor 4185) is so ambitious as her fellow-prize-winner's second selection. They are Wilhelm Popper's "Impromptu," Opus 6, and David Popper's "Fond Recollections," Opus 64, No. 1. In them she confidently displays a rich, even tone and considerable promise.

COLUMBIA and Victor each carry a piano record on their latest lists. In the case of the former the enigmatic Cyril Scott plays two ingenious trifles of his own composition (Columbia 2228), "Valse Scherzando" and "Water Wagtail," a descriptive piece giving his impression of the activities of this bird. These are little more than suggestive trifles neatly worked out and played in keeping. There is nothing particular about the recording except that it shows occasional metallic signs of overamplification.

Victor's disk is of the perennial and well-tried Moiseivitch, who attacks Godowsky's paraphrased potpourri from "Fledermaus." No apology need be made for the original, and Godowsky has published a very definite confession of faith in the matter of piano adaptations. Applying his theories to the melodious treasury Johann Strauss evolved for an entirely different purpose, he has set a tremendous task for any pianist to tackle. Moiseivitch is well up to his average recording level, and the technical department has acquitted itself admirably.

ONE feels thankful to the trio of correspondents who felt sufficiently outraged to question the remarks made in this column about Albert Coates's version of Siegfried's Funeral March. Any excuse for bringing this disk to the attention of gramophone owners is more than welcome. Careful consideration only further convinces one that the substitution in the American set of the Coates record for the Muck version was entirely justified. Siegfried's Funeral March, or apotheosis, that majestic résumé of the hero's origins and achievements, is a monumental dirge, barbaric and sublime.

Without attempting to question Muck's authority, it is immediately obvious that his record as compared with the other tells but half the story. The essential qualities are there, but curiously diluted. The barbaric element deals rather with tom-toms, loin-cloths and colored rags, whereas Coates has managed to express the elementary savagery common to us all. In that first climax the sustained woodwinds beneath the staccato brass and wandering strings strike a note of universal tragedy. Nothung flashes out almost to be seen, and the second announcement of Siegfried's own theme, sailing proudly and nobly, makes us forget what an arrant ass the superman actually was. Here is a genuine expression of tremendous tragedy which leaves us regretting the days of the gods. The Coates record is certainly among the three best pieces put out for the gramophone by any laboratory.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

REGARDING the price of first-rate records, I should like to make a point that seems to be little considered. One's idea of cost and economy run in strange lines. Somehow the same persons who do not hesitate about a large lump sum for a single desirable but expensive object will feel a strong sense of extravagance about piecemeal purchases such as those of records must be. A good many years ago I paid $800 for a pianola piano. This initial investment was more than a splendid collection of first-rate records representative of every phase of great music would cost, and yet I, like correspondents you quote, can scarcely overcome a sense of extravagance in investing in such records. And a phonograph of the improved types, capable of playing such records in a way to bring out their values, can be bought for a trifle.

For many years it was the custom of families to pay hundreds of dollars for pianos that went unused or were largely used for cheap or ill-played music. Contrasted with such purchases, the expense of an investment in high class records that are capable of giving a comprehensive idea of the whole sweep of musical accomplishment and an intimate sense of musical history does not loom so large. The trouble, it seems to me, lies in the fact that the capabilities and worth of good records are not yet fully recognized. A silly superciliousness about them on the part of musicians and others who are ignorant of what has been accomplished by recording contributes toward this false sense of their being an extravagant luxury.

Some of my friends make pilgrimages to Bethlehem, Pa., to hear the Bach B minor mass. Recently I heard a splendid set of records of this mass (as produced in London). This would seem to most persons to be an "expensive" set, yet it costs a little less than $30, or about the railroad fare one way to Bethlehem from my home city. And records are making available to us music that it used to take a journey to Baireuth, Germany, to hear (some of it never heard even now in the Metropolitan Opera House). When you consider that for an investment of $1,000 in a phonograph and records one can gain a knowledge of music that used to take years of expensive traveling to acquire, the most costly of present-day records seem ridiculously cheap. And they are much cheaper than the old inadequate records. Not that I should not like to see them cheap enough to be as available as the dollar reprints of the literary classics, but let us value the blessings we have.

ADOLPH SCHMUCK.

MUSIC NOTES FROM OTHER LANDS

A collection of Negro melodies gathered by Dr. Stephen Chauvet among the natives of French possessions in Africa will be published by the Société d'éditions Geographiques in Paris. The music is arranged for flute, banjo and tom-tom.

The fifteenth anniversary of the death of Offenbach will be celebrated with performances of his most popular works at the Theater an der Wien, in Vienna.

A rare copy of the first score of Wagner's "Lohengrin," with a preface addressed to Franz Liszt, was presented to the museum of Königsberg. Wagner was conductor of the orchestra at the Königsberg Theater at the time he met and married his first wife, Minna Planer.

A hitherto unknown composition for piano by Donizetti was recently discovered in the possession of Baron Luigi Sava at Naples. The work was written when the composer was 40 years old, shortly after the death of his daughters, and is an expression of grief and melancholy. The words were written by an ancestor of the present owner of the composition.

A festival in honor of the French composer Gustave Charpentier was recently held at Fresnay-sur-Sarthe. The composer appeared to conduct his "Coronation of the Muse" in an outdoor theatre. Several hundred musicians and singers interpreted the work and several thousand natives of the province attended. An address in admiration of the composer was made by Georges Ricou, director of the Opéra-Comique of Paris.

A French viewpoint of the development of music in this country was recently printed in the newspaper Figaro of Paris. The writer, Marc Logé, remarks that the recent establishment of a chair of musicology at Cornell University, and the popularity of the concerts for young persons given by Ernest Schelling, indicate an increasing interest in music by Americans.

CHARLOT'S LATEST WORK

Unites Characteristics That Are Classic and Modern—His Show at the Art Centre

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

ANTICIPATING the important exhibition of Mexican art coming here this Fall after its first showing in Mexico City, the Art Centre has been rearranging and extending the already notable collections in its Mexican room. Paintings and lithographs by Jean Charlot form an especially interesting feature, as this extraordinary artist has developed within the last two or three years a style both subtle and primitive, and possessed of an emotional force at which his early work rarely even hinted; of which his complex personality never even whispers to those who know him as a bright young man with an unimpressive cheerfulness of aspect.

Anita Brenner's recent book, "Idols Behind Altars," gives a light but vivid sketch of this elusive personality covering an enduring structure of hard thinking, close study and analysis, penetrating observation and profound appreciation of monumental simplicity. Born in Paris, Charlot arrived in Mexico in 1921, after having worked for Poiret, won prizes for abstract sculpture and woodcuts, served in the war, "a gamin artillery Lieutenant," and won insignia of honor.

In Mexico he did woodcuts, illustrated poems, wrote "neatly scholastic reports" of Mexican art for Parisian and Mexican periodicals, went with Rivera to the Secretariat, where he instructed the masons on the preparation of walls for true fresco, painted backgrounds and details on these walls and three panels of his own, one of which had to give way to a large composition by Rivera; went on painting monumentally after wall space was exhausted, and added to his larger works a series of "very small, very dark, very simple" pictures recording his explorations and esthetic experiments; became art editor of a magazine devoted to Mexican art and customs; copied Maya frescoes and bas-reliefs for the archaeological staff of the Carnegie Institution at Chichen-Itza, Yucatan; proved himself an authority on Maya art to the archaelogists and worked "so skillfully and uniquely under the blinding Yucatan sun that the head of the expedition pronounced him the discovery of the season" and retained him on the staff. His work was done with the "serious preoccupation of a very bright, modest child."

In New York he is "pleased to look like a tooth-paste salesman" and to amuse himself with 5-cent magazines, tabloids, crime tales and movies. Here he feels that he belongs legitimately to the place and the art in whose new life he feels at home.

FROM the work at the Art Centre you would guess neither the range of his variety nor his ability to camouflage his thought and feeling. In a beautiful landscape he shows, to be sure, a delicate liveliness of color and an unhackneyed treatment of form that could not have originated in a mind of monotonous habit or a temperament heavy in mood; and in a lithograph of native workmen carrying on their tasks in connection with the Yucatan excavations his brilliant stylization based on realism and the strangeness of his untrivial humor reveal not only the quality but the charm of his attitude toward art. But most of the lithographs are compressed into the fixed ritual of native shapes, gestures, poses.

Nor does the monotony of these distress him. His own description of his reaction to them is given and speaks for itself. He found the Mexico of social gayety and sophistication appalling. He was shown the National Theatre, the most popular actress, many "too-white young girls with enormously high heels." And they showed him "gentlemen with false collars."

"One day," says Charlot, "I went out upon the streets at 6 o'clock in the morning. At 6 o'clock in morning fair ladies are in garage and their automobiles are still asleep. For this reason I could look upon the true countenance of this city so covered with ornament throughout the day that one can hardly recognize her. Deserted, the residence sections look like a music hall after the performance, but in any other part among the low, cubic, painted houses, beautiful beings people the streets, there are numberless Ladies of Guadalupe. They follow one foot with the other noiselessly, and ancient beauty is reborn.

"Put a chic woman beside one of the virgins of the Parthenon, and that will be a sight to burst with laughter or weep with shame; any one of these Indians is a sister of that ancient. It is the same posture, the same gesture, the trace of the foot on the ground is the same, as is the manner of walking, the foot always horizontal and adhering to the earth like a hand. And when they come out of early mass! Wide skirts, folds of drapery, is not this the very rhythm of the Panathenae? At first sight they are entirely the color of the dust; it seems as if flesh and worn clothing had fused in this gray which is extreme poverty and humility. When the eye becomes accustomed and the soul also, this rebel race discovers to loving observation the beauty of its weaves and of its flesh."

IN the phrase "loving observation" lies the key to Charlot's treatment of Mexican subjects. Spain and France contributed to his mingled strain of race, but, as always, one element predominates, and his art in its richer manifestations is Mexican, and his art assumes for his purpose a rude force that emanates as much from his own soul as from the material of his pictures—inevitably.

One must look to it for any true understanding of this young man, "feather tongued" and boyish, whose mind is filled with ancient knowledge.

Summer Activities Out of Town

THE second exhibition of the Summer season has opened in the art gallery at Rockport, Mass. The jury of selections was composed of A. T. Hibbard, Marian P. Sloane, Yarnall Abbott, W. Lester Stevens and Maurice Compris. A one-man show of paintings by A. F. Levinson is also being held in Rockport.

An exhibition will be held Aug. 20 and 21 at the Lake Hopatcong Yacht Club, Hopatcong, N. J. It will consist of work by artists living in the immediate vicinity. Exhibitors number about seventy-five. The executive committee: Henry Sanford Northrop, Winter W. Myers, Mrs. Roscoe Hulbert and Mrs. Karl R. Schuster.

The eighth annual exhibition held by the Kent Art Association at Kent, Conn., will remain open until Sept. 1.

Recent paintings by Dorothy Byard are being shown by the Darien Guild of the Seven Arts at Darien, Conn., until Aug. 30.

George Wright has been exhibiting pastels and etchings at the Westport Antique Shop, Westport, Conn.

The twenty-ninth annual exhibition of the Lyme Art Association is now in progress in the attractive gallery at Lyme, Conn. It will remain open through Sept. 7.

Work by a group of Wilton artists may be seen in the Town Hall of Wilton, Conn., through Monday, Aug. 25. The hours are from 3 to 6 P. M.

Artists living in and about Manchester, Vt., will be ready to open their new exhibition Aug. 25. These Manchester exhibitions grow increasingly important from year to year. This is an earnest group, containing several artists of prominence and many with exceptional talents.

At Stockbridge, Mass., an art show will open Sept. 12, continuing through Oct. 5.

Decorative screens by LeRoy Daniel MacMorris, the young American artist who recently completed murals for the much discussed Pompeian swimming pool on the Long Island estate of H. H. Rogers, will be shown in the Cushing Memorial Gallery at Newport until Aug. 29.

The appointment of William M. Milliken as director of the Cleveland Museum of Art is announced by the president, John L. Severance. This action fills the vacancy caused by the resignation last May of Frederic Allen Whiting, now president of the American Federation of Arts.

GERMAN ARCHITECTURE.

Walter Gropius, director of the so-called "Bauhaus" circle in Dessau, is recognized as one of Germany's leaders. What interests him is the construction of buildings out of iron and glass, a movement which came from France almost a hundred years ago. In this Gropius makes common cause with his colleague, Bruno Taut, who, while the world still allowed itself wild fantasies, intended building out of chiseled glass prisms whole hill cities, flying buttresses and colonnades. But it is to the credit of both Gropius and Taut that they fitted themselves to the given requirements and, as the first in this realistic age, turned their ability to creating an ideal type of factory and block building as well as suburban settlement communities, according to the principle of symmetry.

AMERICANS IN THE VENICE BIENNIAL

VENICE.

LAST Sunday we reviewed the current Venice International, but delayed comment on the art displayed in the American pavilion. One reason for putting it off was a state of perplexity in the writer's mind. What was to be said of the American group? And now that the occasion has at length arrived, what is to be said of it?

Disappointment, acute enough upon one's first visit to these rooms, became subsequently a little softened. A second survey tended to permit individual excellencies to assert themselves with accent less blurred by the ambient confusion. Still, it cannot but be felt that, especially as compared with some of the really resounding affirmations elsewhere, our ensemble is tepid, to say the least.

The main trouble appears to be that the Grand Central School of Thought doesn't harmoniously blend with—well, with certain other schools of thought. It might really have been better had only Grand Central artists been included this year. As it is, Edward Hopper looks so queerly forlorn in his niche encompassed by Leo Katz, Robert Henry and Emil J. Bistran. No more comfortably stands Eugene Speicher (his splendid portrait of Katherine Cornell!) between the "Margherita" by Ellen Emmet Rand and the "Colonel Driscol" by Max Bohm.

Marguerite Zorach's 'cello boy makes the best of a rather precarious perch over a door. There is a fairly good John Sloan, a curious early Leon Kroll. Karfiol's portrait of a boy (his classic-romantic period) from the Phillips Memorial Gallery adds appreciably to the credit total. Also of prime importance are portraits like that of Stewart Reinhart by Anne Goldthwaite and that of Reginald Marsh by Alexander Brook. A grand Bellows does what it can to combat the rather excessive sweetness that drifts from canvases by Ettore Caser, Marie Danforth Page and . . . and others.

No, the ingredients somehow will not mix. You may rejoice in your Coleman, your Sidney Dickinson, your Higgins (not at his best, though); your Joseph Pollet and Abram Poole and Hovsep Pushman. You may duly note (or rather you cannot escape) the thousandth reappearance of Lillian Westcott Hale's "Portrait of T. S. Hardin," which scored first honors once at the Academy and has since been on the road. With all said and done, the act gathers in only a faltering ripple of applause.

It is almost as if two acts were simultaneously in progress on the stage, with results that can be imagined. Even circuses keep their rings separate. Is this a kind of futurism? If so, it creates no vehement appetite for more. Let us bravely face the issue. The United States is feebly represented upon its first appearance in a house of its own—and this despite the fact that much of the material is of unquestioned merit.

GALLERIES AND WIENER WERKSTATTE

Treasures in Lichtenstein and Moderne Galerie—The Spirited Secession—A Workshop That Keeps Vigorously Abreast

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

VIENNA.

THERE is something so indefeasibly civilized about Vienna, which one appreciates long before beginning any systematic round of galleries. The various shades of difference between being civilized and being sophisticated need not engage attention at this point (and is it Clive Bell who has written so interestingly about a nation's ascent from civilization to culture, or vice versa?) Vienna, being civilized, is also cultured, and, being cultured, is sophisticated. But, possessed of these several concomitants of greatness, it exposes besides a a charm of simplicity—pretty generally acknowledged to be a divining rod by means of which we may locate all such desirable qualities.

"I am sure," one visitor hazarded the other day, "that at the next corner there will be a drug store with a soda fountain"—so curiously does the Ringstrasse conjure a big, substantial, seasoned and unhurried country town. Is it those double rows of fine trees, with the lights of shop and hotel gleaming softly through their shade, and tram cars—the quietest and best behaved in Europe—running along so bonnily? Is it the dignified spaciousness, the cool inviting leisure of the cafés, in one of which the vivacious playing of a Bohemian band (imported and politely advertised) seems just—a little at odds with the leafy stillness outside? Is it a sum of causes, each happy factor helping to brew an "atmosphere" more palpable than that investing any of the once so celebrated Viennese operettas?

Long Summer evenings set a crown of gentleness and rest upon the day's exploits, or coax from hither and yon care-free adventure, still responsive to call despite the decline of pre-war gayety. Whether you heed it or not, there waits at your elbow a sort of bucolic friendliness that yet confesses its unimpeachable urbanity, its chic, even its dash of piquant wickedness. Was it perhaps in the Vienna of this contemporary vintage that Angna Enters caught the spirit of her festival in the Wienerwald?

WELL, in this delightful town it is always puzzling to decide what to do first. One bent on covering the field thoroughly could devote weeks to Vienna's collections of painting and sculpture; nor need the reminder be stressed that a visitor with schedule howsoever condensed should not miss the Lichtenstein Gallery, above all memorable for its magnificent canvases by Rubens and van Dyke. The Italian Renaissance, early and late, primitives to Tiepolo, is also well, though not copiously, represented. The Lichtenstein isn't, of course, to be classed with great national museums like the Kaiser Friedrich in Berlin, where everything is staged on a heroic scale, but it contains much that is of the very first importance. Unfortunately, the palace, in itself not unimpressive and possessed of several fine ceilings, is unsuited to its present use; the lighting is often quite hopeless—a defect made doubly deplorable by the quality of the art there housed.

In search of art more modern, one may explore the resources of the Oesterreichische Galerie, whose collections are scattered but easily accessible. For instance, nineteenth century artists are found in Prinz Eugenstrasse; baroque and contemporary or recent, in two adjoining palaces in Rennweg, with delightful gardens for sculpture, native and foreign. An illuminating panorama of Austrian work done mostly in this century invites study in the Moderne Galerie. Excellent "old-school" artists like Rudolf Bacher get on quite amicably with excellent newer men like Herbert Böckl, Klimt, Gerhart Frankl, Max Oppenheimer (now settled in Berlin) and many others. The collection here, which includes some beautiful things by artists of other countries, is fairly small and amazingly good.

ONE of the writer's most stimulating experiences in Vienna proved to be a call (duration: only, alas, about fifteen minutes) at the Frühjahrs show of the Wiener Secession. There was just time one day after a trip to the Schönbrunn palace to run in, dash through the rooms of the Secession and regret the closing of doors at 6 o'clock. Too often, sated and weary, you rejoice at the command to leave an exhibition so that the attendants, no doubt still more sated and weary, may go home to their dinners. Such was not the case, however, in this instance, for the Secession is by far the best affair of its kind the reviewer has ever inspected. A large percentage of the pictures could safely be moved right over to the Moderne Galerie, and that is saying much for a supposedly "radical" demonstration. Perhaps the secession idea in Vienna has by now become so mellowed that it no longer necessitates flinging discretion to the winds or tearing a passion to tatters.

The art of the decorative portrait, indeed of decorative work in general, and with the poster technique, here reaches a very high level of attainment. Economy, too, achieves frequent and striking expression, as in one of Sergius Pauser's still-lifes, which disposes a few simple objects in an amplitude of space.

Ancient motifs are caught up and given thoroughly modern treatment, as in a quite wonderful "Fest auf dem Lande" by Ernst Huber, or in Julius Hüther's religious painting, "Der Abend." And what atmosphere is contrived by Richard Harlfinger in his several canvases; what strange fine rhythms there are in Oskar Laske's "Ikarus," his "Paradies der Tiere" and "Christi Einzug in Jerusalem"!

Sensitiveness to color and form and to a picture's architecture is encountered again and again. Likewise one feels repeatedly a sensitiveness to the quality of paint itself, which in competent hands can be winning and delightful without undue stress.

WE have mentioned chic, and certainly the shops of Vienna today are the smartest shops on the Continent. They sparkle with new ideas. They fascinate with the freshness of investiture that has been given alike to things frivolous and to things indispensable. Not all of these articles, of course, were produced by the Wiener Werkstätte, which a couple of years ago celebrated the jubilee of its first quarter-century milestone, but the quickening impulse of this group of workers is everywhere evident. Not even the most superficial survey could fail to detect an influence thus powerful, while hours may profitably be spent visiting the Werkstätte shops themselves and the studios where such a surprising variety of material for modern use is turned out.

The vigor, the undiminished enthusiasm, the fertility of imagination with which an idea once revolutionary enough is carried on through all the phases of modern production make the Wiener Werkstätte perennially an item of news. There appears here to be nothing static. What was sensational in the past cannot, it is recognized, remain a pillar of fire by night and a cloud by day for the future. Only by constant rejuvenation, tireless creation of forms suitable to an as tireless process of social change, can the Wiener Werkstätte remain an artistic mentor. It is symptomatic, therefore, of the healthy state of this organization that the output of its shops is as vital today to the maintenance of Austria's position in the artistic world as ever.

THE most dazzling source of information about the Wiener Werkstätte is still a volume issued in connection with the jubilee. Whether this sumptuous object ought to be called a book has always been a subject of controversy. Removing it from its red and black box, you seem to hold in your hands a sort of archaic square title. The "plastic" covers, about a quarter of an inch thick, also in black and red, appear to have been stamped when in a pulpy state, and the finished result is a bas-relief pattern, not less attractive, not even less original, because to some it seems Etruscan, while to others its seems Assyrian. As a matter of fact, one would probably be nearer right in calling it simply Mathilde Flögl, for the ingenious covers, the delightful end papers, and in fact the entire architecture of the book belong to her.

In this book, with its curious marginless typography, its striking use of black and gold and red, you find illustrated examples of all the principal wares for which the Wiener Werkstätte is now famous. Ceramic figures by that delicious artist, Vally Wieselthier (there was a large assortment of her work last year at the Art Centre in New York), and also by C. O. Czeschka, Dagobert Peche, E. Kopriva and Susi Singer, pursuing a similar vein; bags in bead and leather; lace, fabrics of every description; wall papers, tea and coffee services, vases; designs by the late and very much lamented Gustav Klimt, who, while he seems not actually to have been a member of the Werkstätte group, was its good friend from the precarious days of infancy. Also you find between Mathilde Flögl's plastic covers specimens of Josef Hoffmann's architecture—notably the house (or palace) built in Brussels some years ago for Baron Stocklet.

Frau Mäda Primavesi, long a zealous supporter of the Werkstätte movement, showed the writer a portfolio of new wallpaper designs by Mathilde Flögl, which stir an italicized sense of satisfaction. Of course, between samples and their large-scale application in a room lies a gulf not always dependably traversed by the imagination. However, one would gamble on many of these gay, spirited designs, reasonably confident that with intelligent selection of the room's further equipment the result would not disappoint.

The current Werkbund exhibition, which Walter Rendell Storey has recently discussed in detail, spreads out on to a terrace where refreshment and dancing lure many who are not confirmed exhibition followers. It is a device that might well be adopted by all enterprises of this nature, at once drumming up attendance and emphasizing—as it were, dramatizing—the intimate relationship between the decorative arts and simple daily living.

A FINAL vignette—just that—and we shall call it a day. Strolling once more at night under the trees of the Ringstrasse, meditating upon one thing and another, saddened by the thought of tomorrow's departure, one recalled with special gratitude a glimpse of Professor Cizek's little school.

What a small room in which to apply a principle so vast in its implications! The walls were covered with pupils' work—if "pupils," in the strict sense, these fortunate children may be called. And at a desk hedged round-about with books sat Professor Cizek, a man now well along in life but young-looking for his years. There was a twilight of patient disillusion in his eyes. It must be remembered that Socratic theories have ever to ply the uphill path, besides which Vienna is not more apt than other towns at honoring her own prophets.

There is nothing new to report—only that all is well. And this prophet's last words go on saying themselves over and over in the mind's retentive ear, resubmitting their distillation of experience and their essence of high wisdom:

"What a pupil learns from the teacher, that is nothing; what a teacher learns from his pupil, that is everything."

Local Mention

PROFESSOR ROWLEY of Columbia University will conduct two courses in Chinese art this year. His series of lectures on the "History of Chinese Art" emphasizes the growth of style in its reflection of the thought and feelings of the different periods and also particularly stresses the "philosophic" landscape, which he considers "China's unique contribution to the history of painting." A "Seminar in Chinese Art," the second course, calls for presentation by students of papers on special problems in the history of Chinese painting, beginning with the Sung Dynasty. General discussion will follow.

PAINTINGS by Nathalie Newking and Lorser Feitelson are on exhibition at the Brooklyn Museum, remaining there until October. These painters, both native Americans, held their first joint exhibition in New York at the Daniel Gallery in 1925. In Paris they exhibited some of their neo-classic paintings at the Salon d'Automne in 1923 and at the Visconte Gallery in 1922.

During the last two years they have held large joint exhibitions at the Palace of the Legion of Honour in San Francisco, at the Los Angeles Museum, Los Angeles, and at the Pasadena Art Museum in Pasadena, Cal.

THE FIRST SKETCHES FROM IMPORTANT PARIS OPENINGS

FORMAL TRENDS

Afternoon, Evening Modes More Closely Related

PARIS.

PARIS afternoon and evening modes are getting together again after their distinct separation of the last two seasons. The women themselves are responsible for this; they simply could not take time to be always rushing home to change, and the result is that all the courturiers are featuring in their Winter collections formal afternoon frocks, dressy enough to be worn on to dinner and the theatre, and sleeved evening frocks equally suitable for the evening party or the afternoon reception.

Jean Patou's "restaurant gowns" are a good example of such costumes. He makes simple, almost tailored short-sleeved afternoon gowns of lamé, moire or satin and covers them with broadcloth or velvet fur-trimmed coats, in black or in his new rich dark yellow-green. These frocks have slender skirts falling to the ankle, and one black velvet afternoon dress trimmed with Venetian lace actually touches the floor.

Fur Sets Presented

PATOU also features fur sets, consisting of a square asymmetrically draped shawl or pelerinè and muff which also does duty as a bag, in sable, ermine, mink or marten, that replace fur trimming and may be worn interchangeably with the dress or coat, and these accessories add or subtract formality, at will.

The Patou short-peplum evening frocks of brocade or faille with high boat-shaped décolletés, cut out below in front and attached at the neckline with jeweled brooches, that have the shoulder line extended a little over the upper arms in sleeve effects, are also significant of the informal even.ng trend, as is his use of thin felt to make an evening coat, richly trimmed with silver fox, to accompany a draped black and white satin frock.

Lelong gives many of his evening frocks sleeved effects by dropped-shoulder décolletés often surrounded by a little Victorian flounce suspended from the shoulder straps, sometimes by little caps or drapery over the upper arm. His dark green, wine or negre evening ensembles of faille and velvet with the simple frock decorated by appliqué or embroidery trimming would not be out of place at restaurant dinner or cocktail party.

Sleeves for Evening

THE only evening frocks shown by Suzanne Talbot are sleeved ones. Medieval robes of black velvet have long trailing velvet sleeves or old lace, ruffled, elbow sleeves to match the ruffles round a square décolleté. The hems touch the floor when they do not trail, which makes them more suitable to the afternoon hostess, but she could go on to an evening party elsewhere without dressing.

Long-sleeved evening frocks are the sensation of Jeanne Lanvin's collection. They are floor length, of velvet or satin, with chiffon sleeves shaped like an hour-glass, decorated by horrizontal stripes of paillettes with a plain space at the elbow. The upper half of the hour-glass forms the wide armhole the lower half trails. Lanvin makes fewer evening ensembles, too. Her three-quarter evening coats, flaring loose from the shoulder line, are often of red trimmed with black fox. The long-sleeved black frock that they accompany may well be worn for afternoon with a less conspicuous wrap.

Drop Shoulder Decolletes

MOLYNEUX'S evening mode is delightful in its simplicity. He is featuring the styles of the French Revolution with empire waist-lines and drop shoulder décolletés or little puff sleeves, but with much more comfortable skirt fullness than the empire dresses, which he achieves by shirring at the natural waist-line and then, by three shirred flounces attached one to the edge of the other, giving the skirt a gentle progressive flare. These frocks are above-ankle length. Even in Wiener's gorgeous flowered chiffon lamés which Molyneux features they are not too pretentious for late afternoon and in a darker, less rich material and with a long coat they would not be conspicuous earlier in the day. The fur-trimmed fabric scarfs and muffs that accompany many of these costumes also take away from any effect of stiff formality.

Chantal gives some of her evening frocks little dyed ermine jackets to reduce their formality. Champcommunal launches elbow-length leg-o'-mutton sleeves whose sun-ray pleated tops form a narrow yoke at the back to hold them on. They may be removed; disclosing a formal décolleté frock.

Lucile Paray's short-sleeved afternoon frocks of lace or eyelet embroidered chiffon are dressy enough for the informal evening, and their straight lines with fullness added by shirred panels make them easy to wear. Strasse or cut steel embroidery lends fire to some of her dark velvet and satin ensembles for the latter part of the fashionable day.

Maggy Rouff shows a whole group of black lace or mousseline dinner gowns with short or long sleeves.

NEW FASHIONS RECALL OLD

Styles for Fall and Winter, 1930, Include Muffs, Pelerines, Empire Waist-lines

MANIKINS at the Paris openings were not accompanied by chaperons, but that seems to be about the only symbol of bygone days the couturiers neglected to revive. Muffs, pelerines, poke bonnets, Kate Greenaway frocks, off-the-shoulder décolletés, leg-o'-mutton sleeves—the list is endless—are with us again, but in modified forms suitable to the swift pace of 1930 days.

Just arrived from Paris, the sketches on this page today present a number of the high-lights of the new mode as revealed at significant openings. True, there are not the startling changes there were a year ago. Rather, we note further development of the trend to romantic formal clothes that began then while daytime costumes continue to have the crisp, wearable, reasonably short-skirted freedom American women insist upon. The emphasis is on diversity and details, which are sufficient in number and newness to make the strongest minded women ignore a wobbly bank account and leap into unintended purchasing.

The short fur jacket worn over a woolen dress is a fashion much talked of by observers just back from Paris. The one illustrated here poses a jaunty brief coat of beige and black Persian lamb over a black wool frock. Many houses showed this type of costume, including Vionnet and Patou, whose pointed fur capelets are reported an instant success. Also in the daytime picture are suits and coats on the order of the Bruyère models shown here, both of which have been ordered by a Fifth Avenue shop.

Varying degrees of formality come under the head of afternoon clothes, some being so formal as to verge on the evening mode. There is considerable discussion on this side of the ocean as to whether the extremely formal type of afternoon dress described in the Paris letter on this page has a real place in the American wardrobe. One of the most astute stylists in New York, just back from viewing the openings, believes that American women prefer "a good silk dress, not too long," for all afternoon occasions, and a real evening dress for anything later.

Designers contributed several new quirks to the evening mode. Chanel, whose creations are always eagerly snatched up by smart, youthful American women, continued her earlier successful silhouette with the skirt widened and stiffened at the hem. Her new trick you will be hearing about this season consists of several rows of heavy silver stitching on the edges of the black tulle frocks she does so perfectly. Another innovation was her use of tricolor lace combinations for evening. One, in pink, blue and black, is illustrated here. There was a lot of pink, a clear baby pink, in her evening collection.

A brand new back appeared on a number of evening dresses that are certain to be seen in New York before long. It is a strapped effect, very much like the most backless bathing suits you've ever seen.

Off-the-shoulder décolletés were favored by many houses, including Molyneux, who had a most interesting collection. Sketched here are two of his new evening creations, one a directoire dress in lace, the other crêpe romain pleated from top to bottom. Stiff velvet is another fabric that has a place in the formal mode. The Patou ruby red velvet illustrated is trimmed with brown fur.

PARIS SHOWS TUNICS FOR FALL

Couturiers Give Them Prominent Place in All Phases Of the Mode—Long and Short Types

WHEREAS no very radical changes were advanced at the August Paris openings to disturb the established silhouette, new details and treatments were plentiful. Among the most prominent of these was the tunic, presented in one form or another by practically every couturier, leaving no doubt as to its importance in Fall fashions. It is a natural sequence to the peplum that enlivened last season's creations and a more versatile and adaptable detail than its predecessor.

In view of the brevity of some of the new tunics, one might be moved to ask just when a peplum stops being a peplum and becomes a tunic. The chief difference seems to lie in the fact that a peplum may be merely a detail of a skirt, whereas a tunic is really a development of an overblouse.

The Different Types

PATOU, who presented one or two long tunics in formal afternoon creations in his May collection, continued this Fall presenting an impressive array of tunics on daytime and evening clothes. Nor was he alone in this, for a résumé of the August openings discloses the fact that the tunio is progressing nicely in all modes—sports, street, daytime and evening apparel.

The tunic line is well suited to the coat-dress type of frock that is due for widespread popularity this Fall. It has been successfully adapted in the deluge of smart new sheer and lightweight woolens that are flooding the daytime fashion horizon. Patou showed one very good-looking tunic coat-dress made of black wool with collar and cuffs of white piqué. The tunic in this instance was uneven, starting with a group of fan pleats from hip to knees at one side, swinging down in a flat line across the front, curving up with a slight ripple at the hem across the back.

After a long Summer of tuck-in blouses we find the overblouse competing for favor in the more formal creations of Autumn. And in this field the tunic treatment achieves great success. It is especially well suited to dressy fabrics such as satin, lamé and other metal brocades. A lovely one from Lanvin's collection was made of silver lamé. It had a high cowl neckline, long tight sleeves that ended in a deep ruffle of fine pleating. A stitched belt was posed at the waist-line and the hem of the tunic that curved up slightly in front was likewise edged with a ruffle of pleating.

Chanel is to be numbered among the exponents of the tunic and showed them in sports and in daytime creations. One of wool lace, over a velvet skirt, was sufficiently formal for afternoon wear.

MOSLEM WOMEN ARE ADVANCING AT DIFFERENT PACES

Revolutionary Changes by Legislation in Turkey Followed More Cautiously in the Other Countries of the Near East

By AMEEN RIHANI.

FROM the seclusion of the harem women of the Near East are going out to the public school, to the open forum, to the dance hall, and even to the business world. The change, social and intellectual, is evident everywhere, from Turkey to Arabia and from Egypt to Afghanistan. There is also a European or Western significance; Eastern women attend women congresses in Europe, Western women travel in the East. Women of East and West meet on common ground and exchange views and confidences. Thus the old status of woman in the Near East is changing.

How fast is it changing? There is Occidental speed in Turkey; there is a steady advance in Egypt; there is determination flavored with controversy in Syria, and in Arabia, Persia and Afghanistan there is traditional caution highly spiced with modern ambition. Everywhere there is a common urge, however, and a tendency to get together.

At the women's congress held in Damascus last June were delegates from all the countries mentioned. Speeches were made in languages that were not all Asiatic. The representative of an international organization of women in Europe spoke in French; the delegate from Persia delivered an address in English, and the head of the Turkish delegation spoke in fluent Arabic. Arabic, of course, was the common medium, and through Arabic, with English and French as auxiliaries, the cardinal objectives of the women's movement will eventually be achieved everywhere in the Near East.

Eastern Women's Rights.

These objectives, as expressed by the president of the congress, are three: monogamy, the right of a girl to choose her own husband and abolition of seclusion.

Polygamy, the veil and the harem have already passed away in Turkey. The movement, in the most successful of Oriental republics, has in fact passed beyond the first stage of enfranchisement. It began under Sultan Abd'ul-Hamid and progressed slowly down to the time of Mustapha Kemal. Since then the tempo, and not the spirit, has changed. In 1912 I heard a woman haranguing a crowd in one of the streets of Constantinople. She was the first woman to unveil in public, and after she had finished her speech she waved her veil as a banner of freedom. Many women followed her example and soon the eloquent gesture became superfluous.

It cannot be said, therefore, that Mustapha Kemal is the author of the Turkish woman's freedom. He is its official protagonist and its guide. The American School for Girls in Constantinople—now Istanbul—is still the principal factor in modern education.

Women Find New Problems.

The path of Turkish women is checkered with the lights and shades of European experiment. The daughters of the indolent women of the harem must not only go to school, they must also work. They must earn their own livings, find their own husbands, solve their own domestic problems. Freedom's compensations are seldom free from freedom's heartaches.

How much the modern Turkish girl is beginning to feel this cannot be ascertained at this early stage of her enfranchisement. Encouraged by the dictator, stimulated by his edicts, she is bravely going ahead. There are for her diversion playgrounds on the way. And there are dance halls and beauty contests to keep up her spirit. There are also cafés where she may tarry to survey the masculine world or to be surveyed by it while she sips her drink and smokes her cigarette. The girl who once read Pierre Loti in the secrecy of the harem now reads Bernard Shaw and Bertrand Russell on a park bench in Taksim. She is willing to stand dressed in European fashions before the judges of a beauty contest while the editor of a Turkish review publishes her photograph with the nonchalance of a theatrical manager. But other contests of a more serious nature are taking place today in Turkey, and the Turkish girl, even as a typist, is catching up with her American sisters.

The More Conservative East.

On the other hand, her Moslem sisters in other parts of the Near East do not altogether approve of her speed. She is too fast for them, even as Mustapha Kemal is too fast for the mullahs of Afghanistan. The fact is that the woman movement in Turkey, because of its ultra-revolutionary spirit, is exerting little or no influence beyond the Turkish frontiers. This revolutionary spirit may be suited to the Turk in whom the Islamic religion is not, after all, deeply rooted; but it cannot find free access into such strongholds of Islam as Persia and Arabia or be received enthusiastically in such centres of Islamic learning as Cairo and Damascus.

Thus, by its own force and scope, the movement is isolated. But there are before it the possibilities of either increasing in power and overcoming the barriers of tradition or of experiencing a reaction which will force the Turkish woman to take a few steps backward to meet her slowly advancing Eastern sisters. The latter, in my opinion, is more probable.

In Egypt the Moslem girl has a thorny path, and the thorns are not from Europe. Azhar University of Cairo furnishes the nation with hedges of every kind. The Azhar dons, who are more intransigeant and strait-laced than any of their colleagues elsewhere, oppose with the Koran every innovation imported from Europe. Not long ago there was a flaming controversy between them and the young reformers about the hat; and one of the dons wrote a book to prove that the hat is not the proper thing for an orthodox Moslem, that it is not sanctioned by the Koran. Incidentally, in a part of Southern Arabia the sun, and not the Koran, is the recognized authority. The Arabs there, men and women, who are not less religious than the learned shaikhs of Al-Azhar, find it necessary, when they are working in the fields, to wear hats—large straw hats of their own making.

When it comes to argument it does not require much effort to drive the heavy-turbaned Moslem dons to the wall. Qasim Amin, one of the greatest of modern Egyptians, drove them all to the wall, but, apparently, as it was then observed, to no purpose. More than a dozen books were written against this one book, "The Emancipation of Woman." On both sides the Koran was invoked. "Woman's place," said the dons, "is where the Prophet placed her." "The Prophet," said Qasim Amin, "found woman in bonds, a miserable chattel, and after lifting her to a position that was compatible with the spirit of the times, he opened to her, through the very Koran, the way of gradual development and freedom. We are continuing the work of the Prophet." And the reformer, who was an eminent jurist, could not be accused of misunderstanding or misinterpreting the Koran.

A Turkish Woman Addresses a Crowd of "New Voters."

This was forty years ago, when in Turkey rarely a voice was heard for the emancipation of woman. Qasim Amin was then alone, not only in Egypt, but in the whole Islamic world; and now, fifteen years after his death, he is the guiding light of a nation-wide movement and he has many disciples even among the students of the Azhar University.

But the foremost exponent of his principles today is a woman of rank and power, the widow of the nationalist leader, the late Said Zaghlul. When her husband was exiled by the British Government in 1922, she was asked if she would like to accompany him. "No," she replied, "I will remain here to continue his work." Another influential disciple of Qasim Amin who, like the widow of Zaghlul, has discarded the veil and who takes an active interest also in politics, is Huda Shi-rawi, a society leader and organizer of exceptional ability. Lady Huda is also one of the best known Oriental women in Europe, where she frequently sojourns, moving from one women's congress to another in the interest of her country and her sex.

Qasim Amin has also received, directly and indirectly, official recognition. At the Egyptian University, not long ago, tribute was paid to a young authoress whose work was inspired by the reformer, and when the Egyptian sculptor, Mukhtar, was commissioned by the government to make a monument to Egypt, he conceived it in the terms of the woman movement. His work is in reality a tribute to Qasim Amin, for the Mother of the Nation in marble stands erect and unveiled.

But the veil in itself is no longer a vital issue. The change from a heavy material to a light chiffon, white or black, is a significant comment upon its evolution. From an esthetic point of view, however, there is a hope, even among the moderns, that it does not thin down to nothing. The Egyptian flapper in high heels, short skirt and filmy veil is a picturesque contribution to that kaleidoscope of color and fashion. She exemplifies the potency, even the gayety, of silken defiance. And as a recruit she is also often seen among the more conventional of her sex in the political demonstrations of the day. Thus, through the various channels of politics and education, of culture and fashion, the mission of Qasim Amin is being accomplished.

It is also radiating its influences to other Arab-speaking countries through the written word. There are today several magazines in Cairo devoted to the movement and edited by Christian and Moslem women. But the most distinguished among the writers is Mary Ziadi, a Christian from Mount Lebanon, whose home in Cairo is the magnet of the intellectuals of both sexes and of all religions. It is the only salon that I know of in the Near East. Miss Ziadi writes under the pen name of Maiy, and she is fast becoming a power in the woman's movement, not only in Egypt but wherever Arabic is read.

In Syria many other forces and influences are at work. But the Moslem woman there, although opposed to the old traditions, is not ready, it seems, for any radical action. She has not the heroic quality of the Turkish woman, who tore off her veil and waved it as a banner of freedom; nor is she favored with the economic conditions that enabled many families in Egypt during the past forty years to employ foreign governesses and teachers for the education of their girls at home.

Moreover, the spread of French fashions in Syria—the fashions, rather, of the Paris Boulevard, with a powder puff and a lipstick to complete the public defiance—aroused even the Moslem youth to indignation and rage. The Moslem women, dressed in the Paris fashion, were attacked on the streets with nitric acid, which penetrated through silk and satin. Some of them were burned in the face. Later, in Damascus, which is more conservative than Beirut, a daughter of one of the best families, dressed modestly, walked through the bazaar unveiled and was slapped in the face by a fanatical shaikh. These instances of the assertion of a primitive masculine prerogative had, on the surface, the desired effect. They checked the extravagance in style. But beyond the surface, deep in the soul of woman, they awakened a dormant power. Indeed, Syrian women, it was soon realized, were capable of more resistance than they had shown. Instead of publicly protesting, however, they are organizing. And as a reply, perhaps, to the fanatical shaikhs of Damascus, a women's congress was held in that most ancient of cities for the first time in its history.

An Educational Movement.

An essential feature of the movement in Syria and Palestine and Iraq, is that women of all creeds, Moslems, Christians and Druses, are working together; and they are all agreed that agitation is not the wisest policy and that organization is not sufficient. They are all agreed that education is the best and safest road to success. And today in the four capitals, in Jersualem, Beirut, Damascus and Bagdad, the movement for education is even more popular than the Paris fashions. Twenty years ago there were not more than thirty or forty Moslem girls in the various schools of these four cities; today, in Beirut alone, I was told by the Minister of Education, the attendance is more than 1,000.

Beirut, the leading centre of education in the Near East, has more schools and colleges, native and foreign, than any city of its size in the world. But its girls' schools, before the World War, were all foreign and more or less of a missionary character. That is why Moslem parents refused to send their daughters to them.

But during the war, when all the foreign schools were closed, a Syrian woman, Mary Kassab, opened a native school in the building of the English mission. The success of this school was such that the attendance in a few years rose from twenty to 300, and an enthusiasm for education was kindled in all the neighboring countries. From Iraq, from Palestine, from all parts of the Arabic-speaking world, girls of all creeds—Moslems and Christians and Druses—come today to the Ahliyah School of Mary Kassab. The secret of its popularity lies principally in the fact that, besides being native, it is non-sectarian. Technically and executively also it enjoys an uncommon reputation.

The emancipation of woman in Turkey has been achieved principally through legislation, but in Egypt and Syria, in all the Arabic-speaking countries, as well as in Persia, it is being achieved through education. While emphasizing the power of the school, however, the leaders of the movement do not deny the power of the government. The two together are certainly more effective and more permanent in their good than the edicts of a dictator.

VIRGINIA DARE'S BIRTH MARKED IN PAGEANT

Roanoke Island, Site of Raleigh's Colony, Honors First English Child Born Here

By RALPH TOWNSEND.

TOMORROW the few hundred inhabitants of Roanoke Island, sixty miles north of Cape Hatteras, will present the annual pageant that has long been a tradition there, recalling Sir Walter Raleigh's tragic attempt to found a colony on this spot. Here, more than twenty years before the founding of Jamestown and thirty-three years before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, the first band of pioneer English emigrants settled and the first English child in the New World, Virginia Dare, was born on Aug. 18, 1587.

The program of the assembly will begin with prayers, then there will be a history reading, and finally a procession of men and women in Elizabethan dress over the hillside that serves as a stage.

Both the actors in the pageant and the reverent, quiet-mannered audience belong to the fisher-folk population. They are nearly all of straight English descent, dating the arrival of their forebears early in the country's history, and preserving in their speech words and phrases of seventeenth-century England.

Raleigh's Motives.

While the main historical events of the pageant deal with the happenings of the year 1587, the story of Raleigh's determination to plant a colony in America goes back three years earlier. Besides the appeal of such a scheme to his adventurous nature, Raleigh had two very practical motives in undertaking the project. The first was that his finances, always dependent upon the whims of Queen Elizabeth, needed stabilizing with a more reliable source of income. A second motive was the desire to improve his prestige at court. Essex and other rival courtiers were beginning to make Raleigh's position in the future doubtful.

So in the Summer of 1584 Raleigh invested a large part of his private fortune in equipping two vessels for a voyage of reconnoitering the Middle Atlantic Coast, the Spanish being already in possession of Florida. In September they returned, with glowing accounts of Roanoke Island, a conspicuous bit of vivid green that stood out against miles of bleak dunes and spits of sand. The party brought back specimens of plants and animals, two live savages and a folio of sketches made by the artist of the expedition. The sketches are still in existence in the British Museum.

The description of the island was a glowing document. The natives were declared to be a "very handsome and goodly people, and in their behavior as mannerly and civil as any of Europe * * * most gentle and loving and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age." The forecasts regarding agriculture were equally enthusiastic: "The soil is the most plentiful, sweet, fruitful, wholesome of all the worlde." Further in their report, as a hint of commercial prospects, the two captains wrote: "We exchanged our tinne dish for twentie skinnes, worth twentie Crownes, or twentie Nobles; and a copper kettle for fiftie skinnes worth fiftie Crownes." Such barter was no mean incentive.

Among other things they brought back a supply of smoking tobacco, which had not been seen before in England.

Raleign was jubilant. But his first attempt at settlement, made the next year when he dispatched 108 men to Roanoke Island, was a failure. The absence of women was an inauspicious circumstance and the party suffered from a shortage of food and from Indian attacks. When Sir Francis Drake touched at the island for a visit on his voyage of exploration, the discontented colonists deserted and accompanied him back to England.

Still determined, but now badly depleted in funds, Raleigh gambled everything in equipping a final party of 121 persons. These reached Roanoke early in the Summer of 1587. The most serious cause of previous discontent had been remedied. The new party contained a considerable number of women.

Before the party had been long established, the first child was born, described in records of the time as a blue-eyed, yellow-haired girl, the daughter of Ananias and Eleanor Dare. In honor of her birthplace, the parents christened her Virginia. Roanoke Island is now a part of North Carolina, but at that time it was a part of the vaguely defined Middle Atlantic region called Virginia.

Misfortune and tragedy still seemed to lurk over Raleigh's colonization ventures. In the Autumn following the birth of Virginia Dare, the leader of the colony, John White, was forced to return to England for supplies, and left behind him a few score anxious settlers, poorly equipped and ill-protected.

When White reached England he found the Spanish Armada threatening the country and was obliged to postpone his return to Roanoke Island for two years. When he finally anchored again opposite the fort he had built before his departure no sign of life greeted him upon the shore. Hurrying to the sandy beach in a small boat he found carved upon a tree the single word Croatoan. This was taken to mean that the colonists had fled to a neighboring tribe of Indians of that name. The fort had been plundered.

The Colony Disappears.

But search at the village of the Croatoans brought no trace of the hundred-odd colonists who were to be the beginnings of an empire. The savages encountered by the ship's men were either unwilling or unable to furnish a clue. The shots fired from the cannon at intervals brought only echoes. Raleigh's relief party had arrived too late. The condition of the demolished fort indicated that it had been abandoned not long before by the distracted and perhaps besieged colonists.

Even then Raleigh would have tried once more, but Elizabeth had deposed him in favor of Essex.

The spot where Virginia Dare was born is today marked by a slab of granite, surrounded, as the scene was three centuries ago, by tall trees and climbing grapevines. The fort is on a slight knoll about 100 yards from the shore. Dense trees, heavily entangled with grapevines, grow to the water's edge.

Within a few years, it is expected, the wood about the fort will be made into a national monument.

Don't let headaches and sick fatigue, frequent symptoms of INTESTINAL TOXICITY Spoil Your Career

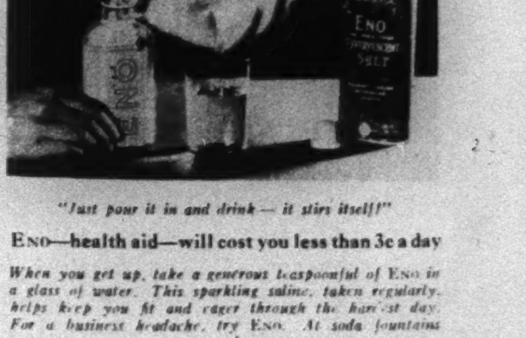
ENO
THE WORLD-FAMED EFFERVESCENT SALT

FOR the person whose spirit and body are handicapped by headaches, sick fatigue and the other noxious symptoms that usually indicate intestinal toxicity, business becomes but unsuccessful drudgery. Yet it really is not necessary to let intestinal toxicity . . . poisons arising out of constipation . . . spoil your life.

Thousands are combating intestinal toxicity with natural means, with a balanced diet that includes fresh vegetables, exercise in the open air and plenty of drinking water. In addition, especially while going the exacting pace of the modern world, a degree of assistance usually is necessary. For over half a century such assistance has been gently and safely rendered by ENO Effervescent Salt.

ENO leisurely flushes the intestinal tract and helps stabilize normal action. It does not gripe or disturb the day's routine and it never leaves one "all dragged out." Furthermore, its antacid qualities are helpful in some cases of acidosis.

This pleasant-tasting effervescent salt is at all druggists at 75c and $1.25 a bottle. Prepared only by J. C. Eno, Ltd., London, England; Buffalo, N. Y.; Toronto, Canada; Paris; Berlin and Madrid. Sales Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Inc., Belmont Building, Madison Ave. at 34th St., New York City.



"Just pour it in and drink — it stirs itself!"

ENO—health aid—will cost you less than 3c a day

When you get up, take a generous teaspoonful of ENO in a glass of water. This sparkling saline, taken regularly, helps keep you fit and eager through the hardest day. For a business headache, try ENO. At soda fountains everywhere.

Mothers!

Here's an easy, healthful way to give children summertime "treats"

It is hard to get children to drink enough water, because water tastes so flat. They will gladly drink a whole glass of delicious Clicquot Club Golden—and it's even better for them than water!

THIS treat delights every child, gives him needed liquid and quick energy, and actually makes appetites better. Buy a bottle or two of Clicquot Club Golden ginger ale . . . open one when you get home. Fill up sparkling glasses for the children . . . see the happy smiles all around.

THEN notice this. Besides the delicious flavor, this beverage has a bracing effect that is visible immediately. It contains "invert" sugar, one of the quickest energy-producers known to dietitians.

Add carbonation, the essence of fine Jamaica ginger root and syrups made from real fruit flavors, and you have this real energy beverage in a most delicious form. Spirits rise . . . the next meal disappears with gusto.

Ageing makes mellow flavor

There's a mellow smoothness about Clicquot Club Golden because the flavor is blended and perfected by six months of ageing in the making. So many ginger ales are made hastily and the flavors are given no chance to ripen. The Clicquot Club name is your assurance of getting real aged ginger ale. And remember, ageing makes ginger ale far more healthful for you and the children.

For your protection Clicquot Club is sold only in clean, new bottles. Unclean bottles are a real menace to health! To avoid second-hand bottles, tell your dealer that it is "Clicquot Club" you want.

Women appreciate the true economy that they find in Clicquot Club. Not only a better, purer ginger ale, but a full-measure pint, the size that you will find most convenient and most economical. Buy Clicquot Club standard pints and you can always open just what you want—and always have it tingling fresh!

These are the sun-tanned men, the sportsmen who race in bay and harbor . . . alert, slim, lithe through exercise, courageous and high of heart . . . these are the men who find keenness and vigor, a matching quality of sportsmanship in "Canada Dry" ginger ale.

Vigor and exhilaration are the qualities of "Canada Dry"

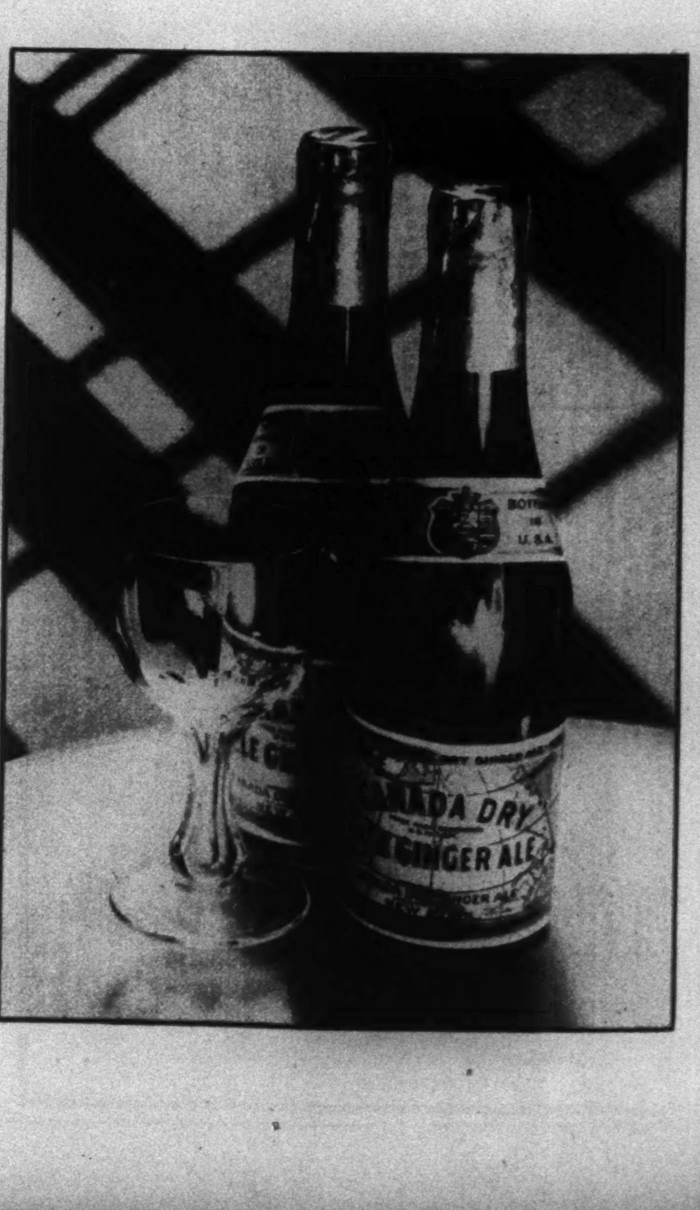
And rightly. For here is a wonderful, exhilarating beverage, thirst-quenching and delightful, delicious and refreshing. It exactly suits men and women who live in the great outdoors.

Its very foundation is "Liquid Ginger"—which we make from selected Jamaica ginger root by a special process. This process is exclusively controlled by us and, unlike any other method, retains for "Canada Dry" all of the original aroma, flavor and natural essence of the ginger root. Rigid laboratory control assures uniformity, purity and highest quality. A special process of carbonation enables "Canada Dry" to retain its sparkle long after the bottle has been opened. Such are our careful methods. Notice them as you drink.

Its prestige and distinction are known the world over

And the result—a marvelous ginger ale, a beverage which has won the approving nod of connoisseurs the wide world over . . . served in many New York hotels and clubs . . . in London . . . in Paris . . . in the Houses of Parliament at Ottawa . . . and in countless homes throughout this country and Canada.

Serve "Canada Dry" in your home. Let its keenness add more zest to dinner. Let its graciousness express your hospitality. Offer it to your friends when they come in to see you. Order "Canada Dry" in the Hostess Package of twelve bottles. Then you will always have plenty on hand . . . convenient . . . sensible.



HAVE YOU TRIED—?

Canada Dry's new Golden Ginger Ale. Never before have you tasted a golden ginger ale with such a marvelous flavor. The secret of its delight comes from a secret and exclusive process of beverage making. Buy it where you buy "Canada Dry."

Canada Dry's new Sparkling Lime. This wonderfully refreshing beverage brings you the lure and romance of the tropics. Let it win you with its keen, cooling lime taste as it is winning countless others daily. Buy it where you buy "Canada Dry."

GOSSIP OF THE RIALTO

The Managers Smile at Last—Louis Bromfield and a Revue?—And the Vacillating Mr. George Jessel

A FEW days of cooler weather brought the playgoers out in force, and the Rialto was filled with boasts of sold-out houses as the week waxed on. On one night it was estimated that 2,500 persons had been turned away from Mr. Leblang's cut-rate counters, and the managers of several fair-to-middling shows were fully convinced that they were proprietors of smash hits. It is somewhat sad to reflect that it is not always August, nor is it always cool. Nor, for that matter, are there always so few entertainments in the town.

Irving Berlin is back in this town from Hollywood, but not for purposes of theatrical production. In another ten days he will turn around and go back, being mightily busy with a talking picture.

They say that Jed Harris has once more been drawn into some sort of advisory association with Mr. Rose's forthcoming revue, "Corned Beef and Roses." At the very least, it seems, he will stage the sketches. . . . There was a midweek rumor that Mr. Jessel would be found cavorting in this entertainment, along with Miss Brice. Just before that Mr. Jessel was busy with a musical show from Germany—a novel affair in which actors and audience mingle to so complete an extent that they never do tell each other apart. Mr. Jessel is a volatile fellow, and you never can tell just what he'll turn to.

Tales of the self-absorption of Hollywood being what they are, one fact in connection with the recent visit of Jed Harris to that city is worth setting down. For it seems that Charles Chaplin, who is supposed to keep in somewhat closer touch with the outside world than do some of his confrères, never had heard of Mr. Harris. Just not at all.

Now here is strange news from a Los Angeles paper. It says, in effect, that Louis Bromfield has been engaged by Florenz Ziegfeld to write a revue—not a musical comedy, mind you, but a revue—in which Marilyn Miller and the Astaires will appear. There will be, however, "a thread of story." . . . It may be true, of course, but the chances are against it. Mr. Bromfield doesn't sound like the sort of fellow who would write anything so frivolous as a revue, in the first place, and William Anthony Maguire has been writing the Miller-Astaire show for several months, in the second. Although it must be admitted that that doesn't mean that he has done any work. At all events Mr. Ziegfeld is due home from Canada any minute now, and maybe he will be willing to tell.

Anne Nichols, who shut up shop and went to the Coast some months ago, is back in New York. But it seems to be definite that she is through with the theatre.

Mr. Goetz is trying hard to get his musical show called "The New Yorkers" ready for October production. It is apparently designed as a companion piece to "Fifty Million Frenchmen," and will have Fred Waring's orchestra and Frances Williams in its line-up, with a further probability of the James Durante trio. Mr. Waring's contract, they say, calls for an opening not later than two weeks after Oct. 6. Or, to sum the thing right up, Oct. 20.

George Manker Watters, who wrote most of "Burlesque," has made ready a new one named "American Tempo," and plans to open it here next month with Vivienne Osborne in its chief rôle. It is something rather big, calling for an orchestra of sixteen, as well as a good deal of scenery. Mr. Watters is producing it himself.

They are uncertain fellows, these producers. Brock Pemberton has been listing three plays as his season's fare, and it might have been assumed that his first production of the year would be drawn from this trio. But now it seems that he is on the track of a fourth play, and naturally that is the one that he plans to produce first. . . . Or "Why Playwrights Shoot Themselves."

Further peripatetic items are to the effect that Helen Hayes got back from the Coast during the week, and that Ruth Gordon, who was visiting her, is also back. And Lorenz Hart, who landed from the Coast on Monday, lingered but two days, sailing on Wednesday for London and the musical show called "Ever Green," for which he and Mr. Rodgers furnish lyrics and tunes, respectively.

The Shuberts have informed the Actors' Equity Association, which likes to know about such things, that they are bringing over at least ten English companies to act in as many English plays this season. They feel, it is said, that the recent collapse of "On the Q.-T." in the provinces was due to the fact that it was an English play not acted by an English company, although returned travelers who saw the play in London report that it was pretty bad even there.

The tale runs that Earl Carroll has offered Al Jolson the sum of $12,000 weekly to appear in a revue—presumably the one to be called "Personalities." Considering that Mr. Carroll proposes to put six or eight stars into that entertainment, and that the others will surely cost him an additional $12,000, if not more, one is tempted to do a little figuring. . . . Presumably Mr. Jolson has not yet given an answer. He is known to look upon regular stage work with reluctance, but the amount is one that might easily tempt him. His picture earnings were said at one time to approximate $30,000 a week, but in these times maybe they have not stayed at that figure.

An entertainment called "The Vanderbilt Revue"—and a very good title it is—is a possibility for the Vanderbilt Theatre later in the season. Lew Fields would be involved.

Mrs. Fiske will go a-touring again this season, and plans to carry no less than five plays along. All of them, of course, are pieces in which she has already appeared.

Philip Goodman wants Hortense Alden for the play called "Another Language," and Miss Alden is acting in "Lysistrata" at the moment, and there you are. So, for one reason or another, "Another Language" will be put off until later in the season.

In another week or so Mr. Gillette will decide whether he wants to resume his farewell tour in "Sherlock Holmes" during the Fall and Winter months. In the event he decides on a continuance of the play, he will visit cities, towns and hamlets not included in last season's triumphal travels.

The new Marcel Pagnol play, "Fanny," which Gilbert Miller is reported to control for this metropolis, is a continuation of "Marius," which Mr. Miller intends to make known here early in the Fall. The action of "Fanny" begins just ten minutes after "Marius" ends, and there is some talk in Paris, where "Fanny" will be done next month by the cast which played "Marius," of staging the two plays on the same day, one in the afternoon and one in the evening.

Howard Lindsay and Bertrand Robinson have just finished a play which bears the title "Oh, Promise Me." Those who have read it say that it is considerably different from "Tommy" and "Your Uncle Dudley." Mr. Lindsay is at present directing rehearsals of "The Up and Up," in which his wife, Dorothy Stickney, has the leading rôle.

Pertinent news from London is approximately as follows:

Noel Coward's new play, "Private Lives," will open in Edinburgh tomorrow night. Besides the author and Gertrude Lawrence the cast will include Laurence Olivier and Adrianne Allen. . . . A new one by Somerset Maugham is on the late Autumn schedule of the Vaudeville Theatre. They say it will be a commentary on the ways and manners of modern youth and that Ronald Squires will be in it. . . . Maurice Browne is now planning a London subscription group on the lines of the New York Theatre Guild. He recently gave a luncheon at the Savoy to set forth his ideas, which seem to be "to build a permanent audience in London for plays that are not generally considered commercial, with a permanent company and, if the experiment succeeds, a permanent theatre." The project will be tried for three years, by which time Mr. Browne hopes it will be self-supporting if not downright profitable. The Little Theatre has been taken for the first play, which will be "The Unknown Warrior."

PARIS, July 28.

NEVER has the July weather in Paris been more favorable to play-going and never have the theatres which are open done so well. But never, by a curious irony, have there been so few open at this time of the year. Putting aside musical plays, music halls and revues, as well as English plays (which are being given in two houses), there are only seven theatres open in Central Paris.

Most of the leading actors and actresses are resting in the mountains or by the sea, or are acting in the fashionable watering places instead of in Paris, where such theatrical activity as there is consists of discussions of general problems concerning the life of the theatre, and especially its relations with the State.

Enthusiastic playgoers who are not French often envy France her two State theatres, her two State opera houses, and her Conservatoire, where singers, musicians and actors are trained by the State. They believe that the money which is devoted by the government to the subsidy of these institutions is well spent, and they admire the way in which the whole system maintains a sound artistic tradition. In France, on the other hand, where these good things have long existed, the fashion is to find fault with them. I have already given you an account of the protests against the awards of the "jury" at the recent annual competition of the Conservatoire. Now various critics are openly saying that all of the Conservatoire's training in acting has become a farce; that so-called pupils are admitted to it who are really experienced actors and have joined merely in order to obtain the advertisement of one of the annual prizes; and that neither the pupils themselves nor the eminent actors who give the instruction any longer take the thing seriously. The complaint is not new. Ten years ago the story was told that Truffier met Paul Mounet one day and said, "I have just come from my class at the Conservatoire. Would you believe it? When I arrived at 10:30, not one of my pupils had yet turned up." "My class was different," said Mounet. "When I got there at 12:15, they had all gone."

There are other criticisms. One complains that literary men like Marcel Prévost are useless as members of the "jury," and that the acting classes suffer because the director of the school is a musician. Fortunat Strowski, who is always assiduously modern, although he is a member of the Institut, has just made a speech in which he suggests that the Conservatoire should concern itself with questions of scenery and lighting and should remember that the modern theatre is not entirely a matter of words but of psychological subtleties, indicated by gestures and facial expression, and of an atmosphere which is largely created by scenery and lighting.

He is opposed by others—and I confess that I am among the number—who say that the only part of the actor's art which can definitely be taught is its technical side—clear speaking, properly balance and dignified movement, the elements of gesture and facial expression; that the Conservatoire is right to concentrate on these things; that the merely technical side of scenery and lighting is fairly soon learned, and is in any case more the business of the stage producer than the actor, and that all the rest is a matter partly of actual stage experience, partly of inspiration, partly of personality, and cannot really be taught at all. Besides, as far as scenery and lighting are concerned, is not their contribution to the success of any play often exaggerated? In going through the successes of last season Lucien Dubech can only find two in which the setting really counted for anything at all, and, even then, not for much. In every other case the public went to see the play and the actors.

The teachers and the pupils of the Conservatoire are not the only people who are accused of lacking seriousness. The other day Emile Mas, of all critics the most devoted and enthusiastic student of the Comédie-Française and its répertoire, took two of the younger sociétaires, Marie Bell and Madeleine Renaud, severely to task for the careless and almost contemptuous way in which they had interpreted their parts in a revival of "Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr," by the elder Dumas. The defense of the two actresses was taken up by Pierre Brisson, the young dramatic critic of the Temps, where his father long held the same post. In the course of his defense he advanced the surprising theory that the play was not really very important, and that to act it well it was indispensable for the actors to be convinced of that fact.

This naturally gave Emile Mas an opening for the enunciation of the principle which Lucien Dubech finds illustrated in the dramatic successes of the year. The book of the words, he says, is not—as some German and especially some Russian producers seem to believe—merely a peg on which to hang an interpretation sometimes directly in conflict with the intention of the authors, as Meyerhold treats the work even of such an author as Gogol. Its artistic merit is for critics to appraise, but actors can only interpret it well if they take it seriously. In support of this opinion, Emile Mas quoted the reply which Frédéric Febvre, a distinguished sociétaire of the Française, gave to a journalist who asked what he thought of the new play, then in rehearsal: "I think it is a masterpiece, and any actor who is going to do justice to an author is bound to have the same opinion about any play in which he appears."

PHILIP CARR.

THE NEW SHOWS

THROUGH THE NIGHT—Tomorrow night at the Theatre Masque. Helen MacKellar is chief player in this piece, which is the work of Samuel Ruskin Golding and Paul Dickey, a pair of veteran playwrights who have not previously joined hands. The players will also include John Westley, Noel Tearle and George MacQuarrie.

HOT RHYTHM—Tuesday night at the Times Square Theatre. That wandering showman, Will Morrissey, is behind this venture. It is a Negro revue, and it is said to be related to the revue that Mr. Morrissey put on down in Greenwich Village in the Spring, although that wasn't a Negro revue at all. Doubtless this can be figured out.

REOPENING

TOPAZE—Tomorrow night at the Ethel Barrymore Theatre. M. Pagnol's comedy again, with Catherine Willard as the woman this time, and Frank Morgan again as the school teacher.

LOST SHEEP—Tomorrow night at the Selwyn Theatre. The return of one of the Spring entrants.

THE SEASON'S EARLY BOOKINGS

Listing the First Occupants of Those Playhouses That Have Made Up Their Minds, and Perhaps a Few That Haven't—All in All, It Will Be Business as Usual

NOT counting a handful of minor playhouses, there are close to seventy-five regular theatres in this town. Fifteen or thereabouts are already occupied, in most cases by productions that will hold their places at least part way into the new season. A wandering reporter has been canvassing the other sixty during the past few days, trying to find out just what is to be expected of the early part of the season.

In some cases, of course, they don't know, for there are still more playhouses than there are prospective plays. But in a lot of cases it was possible to find out pretty definitely, and in others to do a bit of pretty safe guessing. The list that follows is a composite of definite announcement, guarded confidences bestowed under a misapprehension, and permissible guesswork. So these, unless all signs fail, are the shows that the following houses will start off the season with, regardless of how they may wind up:

CONTINUING

Play.	Première.
Strictly Dishonorable	Sept. 18,'29
The First Mrs. Fraser	Dec. 28
The Last Mile	Feb. 13,'30
Apron Strings	Feb. 17
The Green Pastures	Feb. 26
Flying High	Mar. 3
Stepping Sisters	Apr. 22
Garrick Galeties	June 4
Lysistrata	June 5
Earl Carroll's Vanities	July 1
Ladies All	July 28
Journey's End (2d eng.)	Aug. 4
Dancing Partner	Aug. 5

Last two weeks.

ALVIN—The Messrs. Aarons & Freedley will have a Gershwin musical show called "Girl Crazy," which will eventually open either here or at the Broadhurst. This is the piece that was going to have Bert Lahr in it—until a court decided that Mr. Lahr could stay where he was.

AMBASSADOR—"Symphony in Two Flats," Sept. 15. This is a comedy by Ivor Novello, who seems to be as all-round a fellow as Noel Coward. Anyhow, Mr. Novello not only wrote it but will also act in it, and for good measure he promises to give a piano recital some time during the run. Tie that. . . . Also in the cast will be Lilian Braithwaite, last seen here with Master Coward in "The Vortex."

BARRYMORE—"Scarlet Sister Mary," Oct. 13. Miss Barrymore herself will be the star, and the tale runs that Miss Barrymore's daughter will make her stage début in this play—surely an auspicious occasion. As those who have read the novel need hardly be told, Miss Barrymore's rôle will be that of a Negress.

BAYES—They were planning to put a Continental musical piece called "Die Wunder Bar" in this house, but that called for the services of George Jessel, and now it's said that Mr. Jessel may go elsewhere. So who knows?

FULTON—"That's the Woman," Sept. 1. Bayard Veiller is the author, and it is said to be another court room play, but vastly different from "Mary Dugan." The story is that it's good, too.

MARTIN BECK—"Green Grow the Lilacs," Oct. 27. A play by Lynn Riggs, a young poet from Oklahoma, who is also the author of "Borned in Texas," which Mr. Hopkins plans to produce. The scene of "Green Grow the Lilacs" is the Oklahoma of many years ago, and in it the ballads of the period will be sung.

BIJOU—"Everybody Welcome," Sept. 1. It used to be called "Let's Get Married," and that sounds as though it were a comedy. Roger Pryor will be in it, and so will Albert Hackett, who is by way of being one of the authors.

BILTMORE—"The Up and Up," Sept. 1. It is a play about the underworld, and Dorothy Stickney and Donald MacDonald will be in it. It is the work of those two girls who wrote "Subway Express."

BROADHURST—"Girl Crazy," if it doesn't go to the Alvin.

EARL CARROLL—One of Mr. Carroll's revues, of course, and just as soon as they build the theatre.

CHANIN'S 46TH STREET—"Hello, Paris," Oct. 6. A musical show with Chic Sale in it.

CIVIC REPERTORY—Miss Le Gallienne will start another season on Sept. 29.

COMEDY—The Actor-Managers will take possession of this house. They will offer a season of classical plays.

CORT—"Symphony and Jazz," early in September. The producer is Mr. Cohan, who semioccasionally turns to a play not his own, and the author is Louis K. Anspacher, who has been reasonably quiescent since "The Unchastened Woman." Louis Calhern, who was on tour with Miss Barrymore all of last season, will have the chief rôle.

CRAIG—Probably a musical show called "Wells of Romance," along about Sept. 22. The important thing about it is that the book and lyrics have been written by the same Mr. Sturges who turned out "Strictly Dishonorable."

MAXINE ELLIOTT'S—Jane Cowl, presenting "When Hell Froze" on Oct. 14 and "Twelfth Night" a week later. Leon Quartermaine, who was so excellent in "Journey's End" last year, will be prominent in Miss Cowl's company.

ELTINGE—"The 9th Guest," Aug. 25, which is only a week away. Owen Davis made it over from a novel, and it is concerned with eight people who are locked in a room and doomed to die. The visitor of the title, one ventures, is Death.

EMPIRE—Probably "Step-Daughters of War," due about the third week of September. It will be Chester Erskin's first production of the season, and Katherine Alexander will have the principal rôle.

ERLANGER'S—"Fine and Dandy," the Joe Cook show, Sept. 15. The book is by Donald Ogden Stewart, and Mr. Cook will be revealed as a young man who is required to take over a factory—specifically, the Fordyce Drop Forge and Tool Company. For good measure, the music and lyrics are the work of Kay Swift and Paul James, who wrote the Wanamaker ditty in "The Garrick Gaieties."

FORTY-NINTH STREET—"Insult," Sept. 9. It is a play by a Dutchman and the scene is the Dutch East Indies, although the play arrives via England and will be acted by an English cast.

FORREST—"On the Spot," Oct. 20. One of Edgar Wallace's most successful melodramas. Surely you know Mr. Wallace.

JOHN GOLDEN—Any one of Mr. Golden's impending plays—either the Frank Craven play, "That's Gratitude"; the Geoffrey Kerr play, "Ring Three Times," or the Donald Meek play, "After Tomorrow."

GUILD—"Elizabeth the Queen," Oct. 13. Maxwell Anderson's play about Elizabeth and Essex. Miss Fontanne and Mr. Lunt will have the rôles.

HAMMERSTEIN'S—"Luana," Sept. 16. "The Bird of Paradise" in musical form, and they say it certainly is Hawaiian.

SAM H. HARRIS—"The Greeks Had a Word for It," Sept. 15. A play by Zoë Akins, not represented here in several seasons. Muriel Kirkland, late of "Strictly Dishonorable," in the chief rôle.

CHARLES HOPKINS—"Mrs. Moonlight," Sept. 29. A play from England, and with Haidee Wright, Edith Barrett and Guy Standing in its cast.

IMPERIAL—"Princess Charming," Sept. 29. A Hungarian musical comedy done over by Englishmen for London production and now remade by Jack Donahue for Broadway. That's the way things go.

LONGACRE—"The Long Road," Sept. 8. It is a play by Hugh Stange, dealing with the war or a phase thereof, and Otto Kruger will have the principal rôle.

MAJESTIC—"Nina Rosa," Sept. 22. A musical show that has already been out on the road a year.

MASQUE—"The Man in Possession," Sept. 29. It is a London success at the moment and will be played here by a London cast. Leslie Banks, who played here last season in "The Infinite Shoeblack," will have the principal part.

HENRY MILLER'S—"One, Two, Three," Sept. 29. It is a short play by Mr. Molnar and will accordingly be preceded by a still shorter play by Mr. Molnar. In the chief play of the evening Arthur Byron will be the leading actor.

MOROSCO—"Mr. Gilhooley," Sept. 30. Jed Harris's first production of the year will be a dramatization of the O'Flaherty novel, with Helen Hayes and Arthur Sinclair as its chief players. Miss Hayes hardly requires identification; Mr. Sinclair came here several times with the Irish Players and always to an accompaniment of plaudits.

MUSIC BOX—"Once in a Lifetime," Sept. 22. A play about things in Hollywood, with Jean Dixon, Blanche Ring and Hugh O'Connell in its chief parts.

NATIONAL—The return for a few weeks only of "Uncle Vanya," Sept. 22.

PLYMOUTH—"Torch Song," Aug. 27. Mr. Hopkins's first production of the season and the work of Kenyon Nicholson. Night club and Salvation Army background, with Mayo Methot as the heroine.

RITZ—"Café," week of Aug. 25. The entire action takes place in a Parisian sidewalk café.

ROYALE—"The Second Little Show," Aug. 26. It opened last Monday night in Boston, and they say it's likely to be good.

ZIEGFELD—"Tom, Dick and Harry"—but when? Mr. Ziegfeld is due home tomorrow, and if he starts right in there should be a November opening. Three stars for this one—Marilyn Miller and the two Astaires.

ANOTHER RIALTO

CHICAGO, Aug. 15.

THERE is nothing worth saying this week except that "Love Technique," which opened at the Studebaker a week ago with Lou Tellegen as its star, is a sexy satire upon the polygamous habits of mummers like Lou Tellegen.

The schedule of openings here to date is as follows:

Mae West in "Sex," Garrick, Aug. 24.

"The House of Fear," Playhouse, Aug. 24.

"Lost Sheep," Selwyn, Aug. 30.

"Young Sinners," Apollo, Aug. 31.

"The Last Mile," Harris, Sept. 1.

"Artists and Models" (final date after three postponements), Grand Opera House, Sept. 8.

"The Apple Cart," Theatre Guild season, Blackstone, Oct. 6.

"The Girl in the News," Dramatic League season, Princess, Oct. 6.

"The Firebrand," Goodman Repertory season, Oct. 14.

This leaves the Illinois, the Erlanger, the Adelphi, the Cort, the Great Northern, the Majestic and the Civic (Fritz Leiber) unheard from.

GRIFFITH AND HIS WORK

EULOGIZED by the more avid as the "Old Master" of the films, by others as a "lyricist in an age of realism," and by still others as the "father of our modern technique," David Wark Griffith at 50 refuses to have requiems said over his work and stands, physically a tall, gaunt, easy-speaking man, choosing to be known and called a "good fellow" rather than one to whom the picture business owes any debt.

At the Astor Hotel recently where he had encamped for a period until his first talking picture, "Abraham Lincoln," will be exhibited at the Central Theatre on Aug. 25, he showed signs of slight worriment, however. Possibly the fear that the rush of younger men armored with new devices for recording the voice, with tricks to paint the screen in many colors and hundreds of other schemes to make pictures what they weren't in Griffith's time harassed the veteran director.

At any rate his conversation flowed from reminiscences of the time he gave Lionel Barrymore the munificent sum of $5 a day, to his future plans, which included ideas for the filming of an "epic" on the Texas plains.

Griffith gives one the feeling of a "debunker." He may be the father of that which the Russians call montage, and Eisenstein may have admitted his debt to the American, but the director of "The Birth of a Nation" doesn't even know how to pronounce montage and has seen only one of the Soviet worker's films, "Potemkin." "Yes," he says in a noncommittal fashion. "I liked 'Potemkin.' And that is all.

Once when Lenin was foremost in Russia's affairs he offered Griffith a position with the Soviet making propaganda films.

"But," Mr. Griffith said, "when I heard Russian spoken for the first time I decided not to go."

This may or may not have been the reason, but the comment is typical of the Griffith mind. He didn't want his name changed to "Griffithsky," he said. It is his dry humor that wins his friends and his apparent disregard for the seriousness of any such thing as "motion pictures in the guise of a great art." He admits frankly that he is still in love with picture making and would rather do it than anything else, but also, and in the same breath, he views its money-making possibilities and then philosophizes whimsically on the advantages of a swollen monetary larder.

Griffith likes talking films and accepts them completely. He believes that there are few, "very few," he added quickly, who can still make a silent film and succeed. One of these is Chaplin. He sees little need for remaking versions of his early successes, because people would not want to see new stars in the place of the old favorites. He mentioned only "Judith of Bethulia" as suitable for an audible revival because of its excellent dialogue, having been adapted from the Bible.

"Judith of Bethulia," incidentally, was his first four-reeler and it was in his succeeding films that he introduced the close-up, mist photography, the flash-back, the fade-out and other devices. When the close-up was first shown, the audience rose to its feet shouting, and demanded to be shown the feet of the actors. The close-up was difficult to accomplish because the camera man on the set refused to photograph an object when the background was not visible and out of focus in the frame. The first camera man had to be discharged and another hired in order to proceed with the picture.

His "Lincoln."

His new picture, "Abraham Lincoln," is said to have more sets than any previous talking picture and more speaking parts for the central character, and, if that is not enough to recommend it, Mr. Griffith emphasizes the nature of Lincoln. He is portrayed by Walter Huston and made, by Mr. Griffith, to be a man, rather than the historical martyr and sculptured emancipator.

"He is a man," according to the director, "who wrestled and fought and loved and lived like any other being, and we have tried to imbue the character with just that spirit. Lincoln suffered many vicissitudes after Ann Rutledge's death. We have incorporated all of this in our film."

Stephen Vincent Benet wrote the scenario after Griffith had written it first. The latter wasn't quite satisfied with his own work, and when he read "John Brown's Body," the Benet poem, he decided that the writer was the man. So he came East and induced him to return to California to work on the film.

Some of the more amusing highlights in the Griffith career include the time when he was at dinner with George Bernard Shaw, Sir James M. Barrie and Winston Churchill in England. Mr. Shaw let it be known, according to newspaper accounts and Mr. Griffith's description of the affair, that he would like to write a scenario for pictures. Mr. Shaw's offers at the time were more and more pressing until Griffith was forced to the point of refusing him point blank. Later Shaw remarked, when questioned by a reporter, that he had not only offered to write one scenario for D. W. Griffith but to write forty or fifty of them and "on the spot."

Asked of his future plans, Griffith sat back in his chair and drawled: "Well, I'd like to get this film out of the way and then go off for a long rest. Play golf. Swim!"

Then he lit up another of the chain of cigarettes he smokes and continued in the same voice:

"But I'd like to get hold of Steve Benet and do something on this here story of Sam Houston that I * * *."

NOTES OF THE VIENNA SCREEN

By JOHN MacCORMAC.

VIENNA.

ONE of the most difficult fields for the sale of American talking films is Southeastern Europe, with its seventy million inhabitants speaking ten different languages. Of the eight countries which compose it, the inhabitants of four can understand German, though for political reasons not all of them are willing to admit it, and those of two could follow sound films in French, but English audible screen offerings are a mystery to all with the exception of Austria.

If there was any general demand for the advent of the dialogue film it was not from this part of the world, to whose polyglot population the silent film was a blessing, and none the less so because it came from Hollywood. Its disappearance has been a deprivation. That the talking pictures have not been an entirely adequate substitute so far as the public is concerned is indicated by the fact that Belgrade cinema owners recently served notice on film distributers that they could not accept dialogue films in English, since their audiences could not follow them. Neither has the talking film been an unmixed blessing to the owners of the picture houses. They brought sudden prosperity to the first Vienna theatres in a position to show them and are still a paying proposition for the larger houses and the chain theatres which could afford the installation of good American reproducing systems and had the seating capacity to make them pay. For the smaller owners they have been a catastrophe, as may be judged from the fact that in Vienna alone a hundred of the small cinemas have been closed or are on the point of closing.

In a last, despairing effort to insure a supply of that almost vanished product—the silent film—the Association of Vienna Moving Picture Theatres and the League of Small and Medium Cinema Owners have united to form an organization which shall undertake importation and distribution, since renters and distributers have themselves lost interest in anything but talkies. In the resolution authorizing this action some very hard things were said about the audible pictures, which were described merely as a device to enable the American electrical trusts to snatch the profitable film industry from the hands of those who had initiated it.

"Since there are still cinemas in Belgium, Germany, Denmark, England, Holland, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Finland and other countries as well as Austria which need silent films," said President Weiler of the League of Small and Medium Cinema Owners, "it should be possible to have them supplied. I insist that silent films still have a future."

Another result of the change over to sound has been to destroy the local film producing industry. Even in the days of the silent or, as the Germans say, the "dumb" films, this had not been in a very flourishing condition, being kept alive only by a "kontingent" or foreign-film quota. The fact that Vienna is still an important theatre centre and possesses one of the world's best opera stages might seem to give it some claim to suitability as a production centre for talkies, especially of the operetta and revue types which seem to be the style for the moment. But the great technical and financial demands of sound-film production are beyond the knowledge and the purse of Austria.

A "LITTLE SHOW" TRIES OUT

A TRADITION calls Boston a good town for that sort of thing, and to that city's Wilbur Theatre last Monday went "The Second Little Show," assembled by Brady & Wiman, in association with Tom Weatherly, to see if the wonder could be repeated. Viewed at its première by more attention callers than ever saw its predecessor try-out last year in Atlantic City (whence the scouts came home with erring, doleful reports), the second edition again offers music mostly by Arthur Schwartz and lyrics mostly by Howard Dietz, and in general is small and informal. "A valiant effort . . . to keep to the spirit of the original entertainment," The Boston Evening Transcript calls it, admitting, though, that here and there it is just a little more pretentious. That, of course, is at once excused on the ground that the revue is by way of becoming an institution, and hence claims a certain dignity. Until Aug. 26, at the Royale Theatre, when this town will have opportunity to judge for itself, The Transcript report may serve as follows:

"In pattern it is not unlike the first of the series. There is an amusing first scene in which New York is presumed to have seceded from the Union to the relief of the rest of the country. In it, Al Trahan, who is the chief of the comics, delivers an uproarious stump speech as the president of the new republic and Joe Lewis, who is not far behind him in buffoonery, mounts guard as the sentry at the border, uniformed in Irish green but boasting a rich Hebraic accent.

"There must be boudoir black-outs as Ned Wever frankly admits (he is something of a master of ceremonies) so three of them are tossed together, all set at once on the stage. They are less the smoking room brand of humor than burlesques of the genre. For variety the young men of the chorus do a song and dance of their own in long-tailed evening coats, or the lively Ruth Tester and the elongated Davey Jones turn in a song and antic dance like 'I Like Your Face,' or Gloria Grafton in something of the manner of Libby Holman takes a hand at moaning blues.

"Before the first act is over Mr. Trahan, with his former vaudeville partner, Miss Yukona Cameron, to assist him, puts on an act that is a show in itself. . . . It lasts for approximately half an hour, and is typical variety stuff, much of it, indeed, material worked over from his two-a-day turns.

"So it goes with ups and downs as is the way with the musical reviews. There are take-offs on the practices of passport photographers, on the methods by which columnists wring the material for their paragraphs from unwilling victims, on the speakeasies, on the 'lonely hearts,' on the Russian plays with their characters of yard-long names. There are songs and dances galore, prettily conceived and cleverly done—'I Started on a Shoestring,' for example, or Miss Helen Gray's and Mr. Wever's 'Practicing Up On You,' or Miss Gray's musical monologue of 'The Clock at the Astor.' Not all of it is of a piece. Not all of it, presumably, will remain when the labors of preparation are finished. But even as it is it provides a full measure of rich fun, and for the future it promises even better."

LEON ERROL will make his début in a full-length talking picture in "Social Errors," which Paramount is now making. It is from a story by Owen Davis, with adaptation by Percy Heath and Sam Mintz. Richard Arlen and Mary Brian are in the cast, as is Stuart Erwin.

Ian Keith will play the rôle created by Basil Rathbone on the stage in "The Command to Love" when the motion picture version, known as "The Boudoir Diplomat," will be screened. Others in the cast will include Betty Compson, Mary Duncan, Jeannette Loff and Lionel Belmore.

Some will be glad to learn that George Bancroft has embarked on another story, this time a sea yarn under the direction of Rowland V. Lee, who directed the muscular one in "Ladies Love Brutes." In the new story, by William Slavens McNutt and Grover Jones, Mr. Bancroft plays the part of a ship's captain. A review of "Ladies Love Brutes," in The London Daily Telegraph, said that "the plot of the film is credible only because the action passes in a country where crime appears to be regarded more or less as a recognized industry."

Ruth Chatterton will have a dual rôle in her next production, "The Right to Love." She will be seen and heard as both mother and daughter in this film based on Susan Glaspell's book, "Brook Evans." "The Right To Love" will be Richard Wallace's first directorial assignment since his recent return from a world tour. He directed "The Shopworn Angel."

Detroit, the city of automobiles, will be featured in a production which Dudley Nichols wrote for Fox. It is titled "F. O. B. Detroit." Benjamin Stoloff, recently relieved after his duties in directing such madwags as Ted Healy and his gang in "Soup to Nuts," will direct the Nichols story.

Research experts at the First National and Vitaphone Studios have found that musical comedy pictures formed 38 per cent of that company's output during the past season. An additional 16 per cent of the pictures had what is known as "incidental music." The experts discovered also that the melody in these pictures was responsible for 25 per cent of the total production cost.

Paul Lukas will play the leading rôle in "Ladies' Man," the film originally scheduled for William Powell from the pen of Rupert Hughes. Mr. Lukas has appeared in more than sixteen pictures during the past few years.

Clever Acting Makes "Queen High" a Merry Film—Other Pictorial Offerings

By MORDAUNT HALL.

FRANK MORGAN and Charles Ruggles afforded many an hour of delight to audiences by their excellent performances in "Queen High," a vocalized film of the musical comedy of the same name and of Edward H. Peple's play, "A Pair of Sixes." It is a happy-go-lucky sort of film with periodical outburst of song for which there is little or no excuse. The proof of the pudding, as some wise person once said, is in the eating, and the proof of the value of this picture was in the laughter it created.

"Queen High" is a farce that is well constructed and if the ending is a trifle feeble one does not feel in the least annoyed. Just to watch Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles going through the funny incidents was ample reward for having sought admission to the Paramount. It is to be hoped that both these clever actors will be seen in other pictures and one is impelled to look forward to seeing them together in another comedy. It is one thing to witness the work of such players and quite another to gaze upon the rowdy antics of the average screen comic with no stage experience.

Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles are aided and abetted in this comic offering by Ginger Rogers, an actress who can boast of real individuality, and Stanley Smith, who contrives to be sympathetic in a juvenile part. But the burden of the fun rests upon the shoulders of Messrs. Morgan and Ruggles, who appear respectively as George Nettleton and T. Boggs Johns, partners in the feminine garter business. This line of merchandise paves the way for several attractive girls to appear from time to time during the various scenes.

Like Potash and Perlmutter, Nettleton and Johns discover that being partners in business leads to many heated arguments and petty jealousies. Johns engages his nephew, played by Mr. Smith, to work in the office, and Nettleton infuriates Johns by employing his niece, played by Miss Rogers, to do what little she is able to in the stenographic line. Nettleton believes that he is doing the lion's share of the business and Johns thinks otherwise. Judging by the beginning of this film these two have been having it hot and heavy for years. In an early chapter Cyrus Vanderholt appears upon the scene, hoping to change snarls into smiles. Finding, however, that this is beyond his powers of persuasion, Vanderholt, a legal luminary, comes forth with a suggestion, which, while it by no means causes the partners to like each other any the more, at least serves to stir up plenty of amusement. It is that the partners draw a poker hand of cards and the one who is topped is to serve as butler for the other.

This gives an opportunity, of which full advantage is taken by both players and the director, Fred Newmeyer, to make several humorous situations. Nettleton and Johns are more than slightly nervous as they draw cards.

According to the signed contract, the one whose cards are beaten must not only agree to serve the other as a menial but he must obey every whim of his temporary employer for the matter of a year. If the loser transgresses he is to pay $100 for the first offense and in the agreement the penalties increase about as fast as they do with lost tricks at contract bridge when a player is vulnerable. Supposing the butler decides that he can't stand the gaff, then he must forfeit the sum of $10,000.

When the first five cards are dealt, it is a matter of drawing others. Nettleton has but a pair of sixes and Johns holds only queen high. They do not improve their cards, and through turning the camera from one man to the other one appreciates Nettleton's agony, for he presumes that no matter what his partner has he must have better than a pair of sixes. Johns on the other hand as he slowly uncovers the corners of the cards realizes that the next year of his life is to be spent in servitude for the pompous and to his mind inefficient Nettleton. Pain and joy are later expressed on the respective countenances of the partners.

Johns is soon seen garbed as a butler in Nettleton's comfortable home. Mr. Nettleton, being somewhat of a martinet at the moment, informs Johns, who as a butler is called Boggs, that he must wear sideburns. A refusal and Boggs is fined $100, Nettleton having his notebook ready to make such entries. Nettleton sees to it that the young woman who has consented to become Mrs. Johns is one of the guests at his house, and she is therefore waited upon by her prospective husband.

Nettleton does all that can be done to teach Johns a lesson. It seems as though his slave is going to have rough going for the ensuing months, when Polly Rockwell, Nettleton's niece, in her eagerness to patch up the differences between the partners, tells Johns that he can soon end his uncomfortable existence by pretending to be an admirer of Mrs. Nettleton. Johns sees the light and forthwith begins to put Nettleton in a state of suspicion and jealousy. Perhaps Nettleton might have forced Johns to serve out the full year, in vengeance for Johns's everlasting show of fondness, but Johns puts an end to such a thought one day by asking his "master" if it will be possible for him to sign on as butler for a second year. This is too much for Mr. Nettleton, who calls upon Vanderholt to give his opinion concerning the canceling of the contract.

Mr. Newmeyer, who guided the destinies of several of Harold Lloyd's best silent films, has done splendid work in his direction of this merry affair.

"Blushing Brides."

THERE has been at the Capitol for two weeks a film called "Our Blushing Brides." It is one of those shop-girl stories intended, obviously, to widen the eyes of its living prototypes. Except for one or two comedy episodes, it is so fatuous that one almost expects adult spectators to shout their pain and annoyance. The dialogue is as inept as anything that has been written for the screen and the incidents are just about as silly.

There is the department store where the girls are employed. Then there is the villain, who during the day superintends a band of shoplifters and now and again makes appointments with the girls at the counter. There is also the Long Island estate where the famous fashion show is held and, latterly, there are the two disappointed feminine creatures and the one girl who keeps to the straight and narrow path.

This picture, does, however, contain some handsome scenes, which are worthy of a more intelligent type of story.

Jocose Joe Cook.

JOE COOK'S cinematic translation of "Rain or Shine" is a jovial affair, the story of which, it is is to be presumed, pokes fun at circus melodramas. Mr. Cook constantly reveals his sense of humor as well as his ability as an equilibrist. He handles the patter of his part with no loss of time and accompanies the verbal deliveries with the necessary expressions. He is, however, at his best when he is standing on a sphere and turning it with his feet up an incline, also when he is testing his skill as a slack-rope artist and when he manipulates the Indian clubs.

There are several good bits of comedy in this picture, and one of the outstanding stretches is where lions are being fed with palatable but far from satisfying morsels, such as chickens and dishes of lamb. Once they take a supposed gorilla by surprise and make him speak, which seems unexpected to the "animal" as well as to those on the screen who hear him. Even some spectators in the Globe, where this picture continues for another week, imagined that this monster was a real jungle beast.

Schmeling as an Actor.

MAX SCHMELING, the heavyweight pugilistic champion, thanks to a foul from Jack Sharkey, is officiating as the prizefighting hero of a German part-dialogue film called "Liebe Im Ring" ("Love in the Ring"), which is still holding forth at the Eighth Street Playhouse. Herr Schmeling, taking all things into consideration, gives a fairly good account of himself, and while he does not cover himself with any great glory, he at least succeeds in avoiding any tempation to over-act while he is appearing opposite experienced performers. And there are several clever players in this film, which is mostly without speech, but with sound. There is Kurt Gerron, who makes the most of any part allotted to him and in this case does capital work as Max Masse's (Herr Schmeling's) manager. Geron is a weighty specimen of humanity and not very tall. The mobility of his features is marvelous. He can impress one with his anxiety or joy with a naturalness that is very welcome. Then there is Olga Tschechowa's performance as the enchantress. Fräulein Tschechowa is the prettiest siren who has ever graced the screen. She does not affect any sinister glare, although she lowers her long-lashed eyelids to lure Max away from Hilde, his humble fish-market sweetheart.

As in all such prizefighting films, there is the chapter in which the hero is permitted to emerge victorious after his sowing of wild oats. Max has his big show with José Santa, the Portuguese heavyweight, who looks big enough to toss Schmeling out of the ring. This fight, however, is a kid-gloved affair in more ways than one, for both contestants appear to be somewhat reluctant to strike each other with any great force. Max is supposed to be able to fight all the more fiercely because of the sudden knowledge that the siren is a lady of many lovers. She, as it happens, is not vexed with Max, and when he is declared the conqueror she forthwith sends up a large bouquet of flowers, which Max after a look at the siren and then a kindlier look at his real sweetheart (who also occupies a ringside seat), promptly hands to his still half-conscious opponent.

The detail work and the atmospheric flashes in this film enhance its interest. Then there are certain humorous episodes, which, while they might be unconsciously funny, strike one as scenes which any director would expect to be greeted with laughter. Certainly there is nothing to take seriously about the sight of the bulky Schmeling being purred at by the beauteous Olga Tschechowa. It is also really funny to observe Max's old parents sighing because he does not turn up at the humble meal they have prepared for him, especially as there are a few close-ups of the sugar-coated cake on which is inscribed "Dem Sieger." After a flash of the doleful family, including the fair Hilde, the camera is turned to the apartment of the siren, where Max appears to be in a daze as the temptress treats him as another "fool there was," holding his hand and showing her white teeth as she looks at his scarred, low-browed countenance out of half-closed eyes.

At the end of this film, which was produced more than a year ago, Schmeling signifies his intention of coming to America to try his luck in the squared ring.

The sound reproduction, both vocal and incidental, is never very good in this screen offering, which, however, in spite of its story frailties, succeeds in being above the average in entertainment.

LATEST FILM OFFERINGS

RUTH CHATTERTON and Clive Brook are to be seen in "Anybody's Woman" at the New York and Brooklyn Paramount. This film is based on a story by Gouveneur Morris and was directed by Dorothy Arzner. Miss Chatterton plays the rôle of a burlesque chorus girl who meets a lawyer who defends her on a misdemeanor charge. Later, the lawyer, under the influence of liquor, marries the chorus girl. There follows the ostracism of the lawyer, played by Mr. Brook, from his social set.

THE Capitol is showing William Haines in "Way Out West," in which Polly Moran, Leila Hyams and Cliff Edwards are seen in support of the wise-cracking player. As a circus barker trying to "con" the local cowboys out of a few hard-earned pennies, Mr. Haines is caught and allowed to work out his losses on a ranch, where he meets the beautiful girl.

THE Warners' Strand is offering "Dancing Sweeties," a comedy drama of today's youth based on the novel by Harry Fried. This picture has something to do with girls and dance halls. Sue Carol has the leading rôle opposite Grant Withers, and Edna Murphy, Tully Marshall and Kate Price are in the supporting cast.

GEORGE ARLISS'S film, "Old English," will have its première at the Warners' Theatre on Thursday evening. Mr. Arliss appears in the rôle of Heythorp, an octogenarian. All the scenes are laid in Liverpool in the Victorian period. The story concerns old Heythorp's determination to coerce the directors of his company into taking over his friend Pillin's ships, whereby he will insure the safety of his grandchildren. The players in this photoadaptation of the John Galsworthy play are Ivan Simpson, Leon Janney, Doris Lloyd, Betty Lawford and Harrington Reynolds.

"ANIMAL CRACKERS," the screen version of the play in which the Four Marx Brothers were seen, will be on view at the Rialto Theatre on Thursday. In this production the Marx brothers—Harpo, Chico, Groucho and Beppo—confuse matters concerning the robbery of a valuable painting from a wealthy matron's home. Lillian Roth is also in this production.

THE French version of "The Big Pond" is at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse with Maurice Chevalier and Claudette Colbert retaining the parts they played in the English production.

CINEMA NOTES

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS in his next film will be a Douglas Fairbanks in modern dress, for in "Reaching for the Moon," his next photoplay, in which Bebe Daniels is to appear in the leading feminine rôle, he will be seen in the raiment of 1930. It is also announced that, in the same way that Lillian Gish would not be seen any longer chasing canaries about the bush, the athletic star would no longer be viewed as the vaulting Robin Hood or the gay d'Artagnan, a bolt from the blue for many who have enjoyed seeing him falling up a flight of stairs or swimming those leagues under the sea.

Edmund Goulding, lately the supervisor of "The Devil's Holiday," will direct the film, which William Anthony McGuire will write. This also is to be Irving Berlin's first film production.

"Molinoff" is to be Charles Rogers's next film which Lloyd Corrigan and Morman McLeon will direct. In this film Mr. Rogers will play the rôle of a young American who goes broke in London. Frances Dee, the young woman who was lifted from the ranks of an extra to play a leading feminine rôle in the Chevalier film, "Playboy of Paris," will appear opposite Mr. Rogers. Stuart Erwin, William Austin and Leo White are in the supporting cast.

Kay Francis, who has been doing rather well by herself in talking pictures, will next appear in William De Mille's "The Passion Flower."

LONDON FILM NOTES

Alfred Hitchcock's New Talker, "Murder," Wins High Praise From British Critics

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

LIKE Lord Byron in a previous epoch, Alfred Hitchcock awoke the other morning to find himself the talk of the town. He was already more or less famous in the cinematograph world. He was one of the young hopes of the English film producing industry. "Blackmail," which he directed, was a record of achievement. It was, a year ago, described by British critics as "the greatest talking film made"; and it was incidentally mentioned by those same critics, not without complacency, that it was "all English, you know." Then for a time but little was heard of Mr. Hitchcock. It was known that he was hard at work in the Elstree Studios, but his production was slow, and some impatient minds suggested that he found difficulty in repeating the success of "Blackmail." In fact, it was even whispered that the new work which Mr. Hitchcock had taken in hand—the screening of a mystery murder story by Miss Clemence Dane, published under the title of "Enter Sir John"—was proving too difficult and that Mr. Hitchcock himself was losing patience.

These and similar reports have now been shown to be baseless. Miss Dane's story has been filmed with an ability which most of the people who have a claim to express an opinion pronounce to be nothing less than genius. Indeed one well-known critic now proclaims Mr. Hitchcock to be "probably the greatest living film genius"; and another declares that his new production "definitely places him on a level with the world's greatest film directors—Lubitsch and Eisenstein, the Russian." (One wonders why no American names are cited in this category. This chronicle, however, is concerned only with the British appreciation of the work of a Britisher.)

Hitchcock's Start.

Mr. Hitchcock is, by all accounts, a modest man. He is also young—just 30. At 15 years of age he began to work for an American cable company. A year later he boldly went to the London head of the Paramount organization and informed him that the captions on the Paramount films were "rotten." The young man—the youth, rather—was given a job at writing captions that were not "rotten." He developed new ideas, and in course of time came to be engaged by British International Pictures as a director at a salary which was colossal in English eyes. "Blackmail," and then "Juno and the Paycock" followed; and now comes Mr. Hitchcock's newest "triumph." Miss Dane's story has been given a new title. "Enter Sir John" might have meant anything or nothing. As "Murder" it has the merit of clarity. People who go to see it will at least know what they think they are going to see. Whether they will be quite as clear in their impressions when they come away after seeing it may be another matter. In fact, to some intelligences the title may seem to be altogether a misnomer. "Low-brows" may even suspect that Mr. Hitchcock is a "high-brow" who is trying to poke fun at them.

A Dual Feat.

The combined acuity of perception of Hollywood will, of course, at once realize that Mr. Hitchcock has essayed the double feat of presenting a story that grips and making a satire that gently stirs the critical faculty. The general public is informed that this picture "seems to have taken as its model the mass of back-stage and underworld drama produced in the last two years in Hollywood and as its aim the raising of such drama to a point at which it ceases to be an intellectual offense." Hollywood has been burlesqued very effectively on the screen, by itself as well as by outsiders. Will the general public appreciate the satirical interest of this British gesture of disdain for methods which have succeeded so well from a box-office point of view?

Picture Highly Praised.

Extraordinary praise is lavished upon Mr. Hitchcock's innovations in the matter of screen technique. "Murder" is said to "carry the sound film further into the future than any previous production." Who but Mr. Hitchcock, it is asked, would think of introducing a flash of a glass of stout, flanked by a hunk of bread and a piece of cheese, at the moment when a prosperous play-producer is inviting a needy actor to lunch? Again, Mr. Hitchcock's hero is shaving himself while he is thinking of a young woman who has just been condemned to death. The producer wants to convey to his audience some idea of the procession of thoughts passing through the man's mind as he draws the razor over his chin. How does he accomplish this? By giving a flash-back in the mirror? No, that is for Mr. Hitchcock an old and of course discredited method. Instead of a flash-back, there comes from a wireless set in the room the strains of an orchestra playing the "Liebestod" from "Tristan." It is this sort of effect which Mr. Hitchcock's enthusiastic admirers acclaim as the mark of his transcendent genius.

And yet again Mr. Hitchcock conveys the impression that his hero is a poverty-stricken actor by making a carpet wave under his feet as he enters a rich manager's office. You see if the poor fellow were accustomed to wealth of surroundings he would never notice that the carpet was luxuriously soft and thick—it wouldn't rise up and strike his consciousness.

Can this be the line of ultimate development of the technique of the screen? Miss Clemence Dane, the authoress of "Enter Sir John," left the scenario writing of "Murder" to other hands—those of either Miss Helen Simpson or Miss Alma Reville, of whom the latter is Mr. Hitchcock's wife—because she was otherwise occupied in writing three plays for Miss Sybil Thorndike and finishing a novel. But her views about the audible screen are peculiarly interesting. "I believe in the talking pictures for my own special reasons," she told an interviewer. "They will eventually bring back poetic verse to the stage because audible films and the wireless are educating the public to think with their ears and listen with their eyes."

"New Art" of Cinema.

Hollywood, of course, may deride such sentiment as "piffle." That public for which Hollywood caters may hold a similar opinion. But British International Pictures appears to have faith in the combined genius of Miss Clemence Dane and Mr. Alfred Hitchcock and doubtless mutters: "Damn the public, anyhow!" It will be a month or more before the public is given the opportunity to register its verdict as to this specimen of the "new art" of cinematography.

Mr. Herbert Marshall, an English actor well known to American theatregoers, scores a great success as Sir John Menier, the amateur detective who has to race against time to discover the true murderer and free the woman whom he, as one of a jury of twelve good men and true, had virtually condemned to death. The heroine is Miss Norah Baring. She has few opportunities to reveal her talents, of which Elstree directors think so highly that she is given some rôle or other in almost every film produced there. "Murder" certainly does not err on the side of excessive "sex appeal," and for this reason, as well as for some others, some proportion of cinema enthusiasts will presumably consider the production slow.

HOLLYWOOD HAPPENINGS

HOLLYWOOD, Cal.

THE Hollywood studios are in a constant state of reajustment to suit changing needs, and one of the most important and far-reaching of the new requirements is the making of talking pictures in foreign languages. Small groups of foreign actors are being assembled in various studios and many of the already established players with linguistic accomplishments are extending their borders by working in two or three languages. One of the most interesting twists of the new ordering is putting Ramon Novarro in the position of director for the first time. Mr. Novarro is taking to his new work with surprising alacrity. He sits all day at a desk, a very unromantic desk in a bare little office, and interviews endless applicants for positions in the picture he is about to put through its paces. Having just finished "The Singer of Seville"—its title is being changed to the lurid and laborious "Call of the Flesh," quite against Mr. Novarro's wishes—M-G-M has decided to film this story of a young opera singer who through failure finds success in the star's native tongue. As a finale in the picture Mr. Novarro sings the famous "Ridi Pagliacci." At another point in the picture he dances a Spanish number with René Adorée that again recalls the famous tango that Valentino did with such aplomb in "The Four Horsemen."

Many amusing incidents come to pass during a session as director, and Ramon Novarro has had his good share in getting ready for the big event of taking a picture into his own hands for the first time and handling it as if it were one of the musical numbers that he stages in his own private theatre. As the whole affair is being carried through in Spanish, he will enjoy comparative immunity from the official studio interference and supervision that so often wreck the artistic intent of a director. It will be well worth a critic's time to look up the Spanish replica that he is about to conjure forth and to compare it with the English version, for there may be some valuable lessons to be drawn from the comparison. Handling Spanish and Mexican players is not altogether a simple matter, since they are extraordinarily touchy as to rank and perquisites. They are all stars. One applicant, a well-known player in Spain, was quite willing to play second to Mr. Novarro, provided that Mr. Novarro agree to take a secondary rôle to the Spanish actor in some future film. It was tactfully explained that existing contracts with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer precluded any such pleasant possibility. So, perhaps, Mr. Novarro's initial adventure in directing may be the first and also the last, since one man cannot be expected to be all things in the complicated game of making motion pictures. Other ambitious picture stars have found this out to their cost. The new Novarro film should be a riot in the Latin countries.

An Excellent Team.

Until the coming of the sound screen, Mr. Novarro was perhaps the only actor on the M-G-M lot to possess qualifications for artistic acclaim in other departments of the arts. Now he has as next-door neighbors such sterling artists as Lawrence Tibbett and Grace Moore, both of whom are being starred in a version of "The New Moon." Here there should be high romantic accomplishment with vocal frills aplenty, as both these grand opera stars are eminently qualified for spirited dramatic action and glamorous appearance before the cameras. Mr. Tibbett is something of an old hand at the camera game, with his "The Rogue Song" behind him, but Miss Moore is in the throes of picking her way about the intricate maze of hawk-eyed cameras and sleuth-like microphones. With only two days off since arriving in Hollywood, she has rushed from one scene to another, with hardly time for meals, what with all the singing lessons and rehearsals and getting up new lines and music. But she admits that being on the crest of one's own wave is rather thrilling, after all, and now, with "Jenny Lind" behind her, "The New Moon" in the making, and a spectacular version of "The Merry Widow" to follow in short order, there won't be much chance to play around in Hollywood before she dashes off to fulfill her European contracts for the coming season. M-G-M is anxiously casting about for a successor to John Gilbert in the Prince Danilo rôle, and I should think it a rather difficult task not only to find some one to equal his performance in that silent picture, but to partner Miss Moore with a singing actor of equal calibre.

Edgar Selwyn has his hands full directing a bevy of fair maids through Becky Gardiner's adaptation of "War Nurse." It was difficult to recognize familiar faces in the group of veiled ladies sitting about the Selwyn set, the Alice-blue—used for purely photographic purposes—of their uniforms and head-pieces making them look like part of a Ziegfeld version of a wartime hospital staff. Za-Su Pitts was there, her large plaintive eyes and expressive hands making her identity easier than in the case of Hedda Hopper, whose usual garb is the last word from the smartest Paris houses. The shooting was all being done behind screens the morning I chanced by, being one of those episodes when good war nurses get together, I suppose. Not even Robert Montgomery was around, so it must have been part of the picture when the leading man is taboo as well. Open house prevailed on the "Three French Girls" set, however, and it was comforting to find Fifi Dorsay being married in white and not robin's egg blue, even if it was hard on the camera man. With Reginald Denny and George Grossmith and Cliff Edwards romping through a farcical French wedding, and with an assorted group of French extras for devoted peasantry, the microphones were busy catching the latest Wodehouse bon-mots. Burton Holmes is another notable on the M-G-M roster, as he is being initiated in the art of monologuing his travel pictures for the biggest audience he ever entertained.

Out in a corner of the big M-G-M lot is a little corner where two bona-fide Africans are domiciled. Mutia and Riano by name, brought to Hollywood by W. S. Van Dyke to insure the proper color for any retakes that the long-awaited "Trader Horn" film may need. They play characters in this colorful conception of African river life, and are the oddest note to be found in this extraordinary community where it is possible to find at least one of most everything under the sun. It's a pity that their Swahili vocabulary is limited to some 200 words, else they could put down their Hollywood impressions in as interesting form as Mr. Van Dyke has done in his African diary, which, by all accounts, is filled with enough vivid material (gathered on the longest and most arduous picture hike on record) to warrant publishing.

It's an ill wind that doesn't change somebody's luck, and the switch-about that has come to so many stars of the older order owing to enforced dialogue on the screen now finds Vilma Banky, Samuel Goldwyn's dazzling blonde importation from Budapest, about to step forth before the footlights on Broadway. With her equally well-known husband, Rod La Rocque, she will be starred this Autumn by Arch Selwyn in the new comedy that Anita Loos and John Emerson have written about Hungarian amours. The part should suit Miss Banky, and the accent, which has proved to be a stumbling-block on the screen, should serve her well in the theatre. This will be Miss Banky's first appearance on any stage, as she has never been seen in her own country except on the screen. She is at the moment en route for Paris and Budapest on a flying visit for clothes and a brief family reunion, her second time in Hungary since Mr. Goldwyn brought her to America to star with Ronald Colman. NOTES OF THE BERLIN SCREEN

By C. HOOPER TRASK.

BERLIN.

THE new German regulations concerning the importation of foreign films into Germany have met with a storm of disapproval. Instead of being milder, as one might have expected, they are considerably more severe than formerly. Although 230 full-length features may be imported, less than half of these, 110, can be talkers. As no good silents are being produced anywhere in the world today, this makes 120 of the permits practically illusory. The American producers contend that the sound quota will come nowhere near fulfilling their needs, especially as a certain proportion of the foreign films imported will be of French and English origin. Moreover, these 110 permits are left very much in the hands of the Department of the Interior. Forty are to be allotted to the renting firms on the basis of the number of German pictures which they distributed within the last two seasons. Twenty will be assigned to companies which have sold German pictures for distribution in foreign countries (but these will not be available before Jan. 1, 1931). The final 50 are left entirely at the disposal of the Minister of the Interior, who can distribute them as he desires. The American producing firms are particularly annoyed at this, because it leaves their status so indefinite, everything depending on the last minute decision of a politician.

But not only the Americans are protesting. Dissatisfaction is also expressed by the German firms who had made arrangements with British or French companies to produce jointly. That scheme consists of making a talker in Paris or London with a German version, for which the Germans foot the bill, and later a different picture in Berlin with an English or French version, for which the foreign capitalists pay their share. But the new regulations are very strict in defining what constitutes a German talker. It specifies that:

(a) The producers must be a German company.

(b) The interiors and exteriors, except where the story makes unavoidable demands, must be taken in Germany.

(c) The scenario and music must be written by Germans.

(d) The director must be German.

(e) The majority of the actors must be German citizens.

This would, of course, greatly hinder these cooperative arrangements which tend to make for internationalism in the industry. That the Minister of the Interior has promised to treat such pictures with especial consideration does not help matters much, as, in any case, they would use up permits needed for other films.

Although no official statements have been made, it is generally known that the American industry is not willing to accept the new regulations in their present form. I have it on good authority that the most important American producers, who also control the key theatres in America, have issued an ultimatum to the German producers that, unless they bring pressure to bear to have the regulations revised, German pictures will be boycotted in America next season. At any rate, even though the patent quarrel has been settled amicably and talkers recorded on German equipment may now be shown in America, most of the local firms have canceled their plans for English versions. And, unless the Germans have some hope of selling a feature to the English-speaking countries, they dare not produce anything of a spectacular nature, as they would then have no chance of getting their investment back. But just as in the patent situation some satisfactory compromise is sure to be reached sooner or later, for the good of the patron of the talker it cannot come quickly enough.

Ufa's Fall Program.

THE Ufa is starting its Fall program early. In the latter part of July it brought out at the Ufa Palast a talker which promises to run into the Winter. This is "Der Schuss im Tonfilm Atelier" ("The Shot in the Talker Studio"). Kurt Siodmak's idea of setting a mystery plot in a talker studio was an artful one. Audiences like to look behind the scenes and there is always something fascinating about machinery. The system of taking dialogue pictures is still shrouded in mystery and the elaborate electrical equipment has something almost supernatural about it.

So the director, Alfred Zeisler, merely had to turn out competent workmanship—the high bare brick walls, the weird looking lighting equipment, the microphones hung at strange angles, the camera enclosed in a huge box with a glass front did the rest. The story, which suffices to keep things moving, concerns the murder of a film actress. At the very moment when she is supposedly shot in a scene, she is actually killed by a revolver bullet. The male and female stars of the picture within the picture are both suspected, as they have been playing in the shot with her and have each had a revolver in their hands.

The featured players are Gerda Maurus and Harry Frank. The latter is a competent-enough leading man with a rich musical voice, but Miss Maurus is a left-over from the days when Fritz Lang, who was responsible for "Nibelungen" and "Metropolis," had much to say in Ufa affairs. I am not enthusiastic about her.

STARS AND THEIR NEW PICTURES

INA CLAIRE will arrive in New York this week for work in "The Royal Family," the George Kaufman-Edna Ferber play, which will be filmed at the Paramount New York studio. During the past season Miss Claire has been appearing on the Los Angeles stage. George Cukor and Cyril Gardner will co-direct the film and Frederic March, having completed his role opposite Nancy Carroll in "Laughter" at the Eastern studio, will have the leading male rôle.

Warner Baxter and Edmund Lowe will be teamed again in "The Cisco Kid." This will be the first time these players have been brought together in a film since "In Old Arizona." John Ford, who is now directing "Up the River," will produce "The Cisco Kid."

Before returning to New York this Fall, where he will appear in a play under the direction of Arthur Hopkins, Walter Huston will act in another film, in which Dolores Del Rio will have the leading feminine rôle. Willard Mack has written the story, the title as yet unannounced, and Thornton Freeland will direct it.

Universal has acquired two new authors for its scenario department. The first is Faith Baldwin, who wrote "Office Wife," and the other Dora Macy, author of "Ex-Mistress." Mary Lawlor will appear in a story to be written by Miss Baldwin.

MUSIC NEWS FROM ENGLAND, GERMANY AND RUSSIA

SIEGFRIED WAGNER

Shock of Mother's Death and Preparations For Baireuth Festival Hastened End

SIEGFRIED, last of the Wagner triumvirate, has joined his father and mother in Valhalla. Except for a few days directly after his birth and at his death, his place in the sun was obfuscated by the reflected glow and glare of the glory of his father, Richard the Great, and of his mother, Cosima, wife of the composer and daughter of Franz Liszt. Psychologists have shown the handicaps which more often than not rule out all but the strongest men who are lone children, who are younger brothers of strong-willed older sons, or who, most difficult of all, are sons of acclaimed geniuses. The adjective "acclaimed" is especially significant, since for a long time there has been much twaddle written about heredity and genius, whereas it is only just being realized that the handicap has hitherto not been so much the genius of a man's father as the fact that his eminence almost invariably forces the son into the background. Some day, it is to be hoped, a profound psychoanalyst will make a study of those cases where the father has died before his great gifts have been recognized and has thus allowed the inherent rights of his son to develop fairly. Only until such an exhaustive study has been made will the world be able to gauge the man and musician Siegfried Wagner, and hazard an opinion concerning his potential gifts and greatness and their possible development had they been permitted to grow unchecked. We have but to recall the somewhat pathetic banker, Abraham Mendelssohn, who was wont to repeat plaintively that first he was always simply the son of the distinguished philosopher Moses, and later merely the father of the eminent composer, Felix.

WHATEVER Siegfried was to the world at large, he meant very much indeed to his father, Richard, whose letters of the time are full of his new and great happiness. Wagner had married Cosima, daughter of Liszt, at Lucerne Aug. 25, 1870. Siegfried was born at Triebschen on June 6, 1869. In November, the year of his marriage, the composer wrote to Ferdinand Praeger: "My house, too, is full of children, the children of my wife's, but there also blooms for me a splendid son, strong and beautiful, whom I dare to call Siegfried Richard Wagner. Now think what I must feel that this at last has fallen to my share. I am 57 years old." A few weeks later he wrote again, "Richard, my son! Oh, what that says to me!" It is strange and paradoxical this, the paternal outburst of Richard Wagner, the arch-enemy of accepted codes of ethics, outdoing in emotion the humblest father unblest with any vestige of genius! To still another friend he wrote at this time: "She has borne me a wonderfully beautiful and vigorous boy, whom I could boldly call Siegfried. He is now growing, together with my work, and gives me a new, long life which has at last attained a meaning. Thus we get along without the world from which we have entirely retired." What his son's coming meant may partly be understood when we recall his renewed activities afterward.

DURING the month of November, 1870, Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyll," with the original title standing as the "Triebschener Idyll." It was the birthday gift by the composer to his wife. After a few rehearsals with Zurich musicians, and Hans Richter playing trumpet and viola, it was given early one morning at the top of the stairs of the Villa Triebschen. The composer conducted. His own poetic dedication read in part:

and later,

"So Siegfried hold, wie freundlich uns'rem Sohn,
Mit deiner Huld sei ihnen jetzt erschlossen,
Was sonst als tönend Glück wir still genossen."

The son was born while the music drama bearing his name was being composed. All the themes are drawn from it excepting the lovely oboe solo "Schlafe, Kindchen, Schlafe," the cradle song.

Now Richard loved Siegfried more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age; and he made him a tone-poem of many colors.

AS a fittingly romantic ending to the tale comes the report that the little house in Lucerne where Richard Wagner lived with Cosima, his wife, after their marriage in the church behind the Schweizerhof Hotel, has been bought by the city authorities, who plan to arrange the house both inside and out as nearly as possible as it was when the composer lived there and wrote some of his greatest masterpieces.

From this time on, all during his life, Siegfried was forced to appear in the eyes of the world as the son of Richard the Great. He studied drawing and mathematics for a short time, but returned to music. He composed more than a dozen operas and conducted his father's works without score. He came to this country to get funds to carry on, to bear out the words of his father: "My son will preserve my works to the world." He was a gifted stage director at Baireuth. But he never could be simply Siegfried Wagner. He was always to be Richard's son. A week before this year's festival at Baireuth he fell ill. For the first time since the shrine founded by his father had given performances, no Wagner was present. Cosima, his mother, had joined Richard a few months ago.

What his thoughts were as he lay awaiting the end can only be conjectured. His last known wish was that the festival go on. Perhaps he recalled the lines of Goethe:

Des Menshen Seele
Gleicht dem Wasser:
Vom Himmel kommt es,
Zum Himmel steigt es,
Zur Erde musz es,
Ewig wechselnd.

Perhaps as he lay tired, there came to him Heine's stanza:

"Der Tod, das ist die kühle Nacht
Das Leben ist der schwüle Tag.
Es dunkelt schon, mich schläfert,
Der Tag hat mich müd' gemacht."

Edmund Waller's magical sestet,

"The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light through chinks that Time hath made:
Stronger by weakness, wiser men become
As they draw near to their eternal home.
Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view
That stand upon the threshold of the new,"

comes to mind.

Once more, when he had joined his father and mother, did he come into his own again. Of him it may truly be said that his life was dedicated to music and that he gave to it his best. Not many have earned such an epitaph. For the world of music, now that no one of the blood is left to carry on, the paramount question is, What will be the future of Baireuth?

IN deference to the wishes of Siegfried Wagner, the Baireuth administrative committee announces that the Baireuth Festival program will be carried on according to schedule. In a communiqué dated Aug. 5, which has just arrived on this side, the committee presents official details of "Siegfried Wagner's Illness."

"The son of the composer," says the communication in part, "became very ill on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 16th of July. He had experienced much difficulty in breathing some days before, though the illness seemed quite sudden to many people far from the scene. This impression was partly due to the fact that Siegfried Wagner refused to absent himself from the festival despite the attempts of his physicians to dissuade him. Toward 7 in the evening he collapsed with a severe and dangerous heart attack. His condition became so grave that he was immediately brought to the hospital in an automobile. The attending physicians succeeded in bringing the patient out of immediate danger by 11 o'clock that night and diagnosed his illness on the following morning as a muscular enlargement of the heart, complicated by very low blood pressure and swelling of the liver. In addition, catarrhal inflammation developed and the right lung became affected.

"There was no fever and the patient was fully conscious at all times until twelve hours before his death. From this time until the morning of Monday, Aug. 4, there were repeated consultations among the physicians. At 7 o'clock he ceased giving broken answers to appeals. His breath came with the greatest difficulty and he sank into the deepest coma. A few moments before his death his eyes opened wide, his gaze was fixed upward in the distance, his face became strikingly youthful, and the characteristic Siegfried Wagner expression in his features struck the beholder. He passed away at 5:30 on the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 4. He seemed spared of pain.

SIEGFRIED WAGNER had experienced difficulty in breathing some months before, beginning noticeably on July 16. He suffered a spiritual and physical collapse at the unexpected death of his mother, news of which he received while in Southern Switzerland. There is no doubt that the strain and excitement of the four weeks preceding this year's festival had its part in hastening his end. He labored during these four weeks from 7 in the morning until after midnight and for weeks slept very little. His time was further taken up with inevitable social duties.

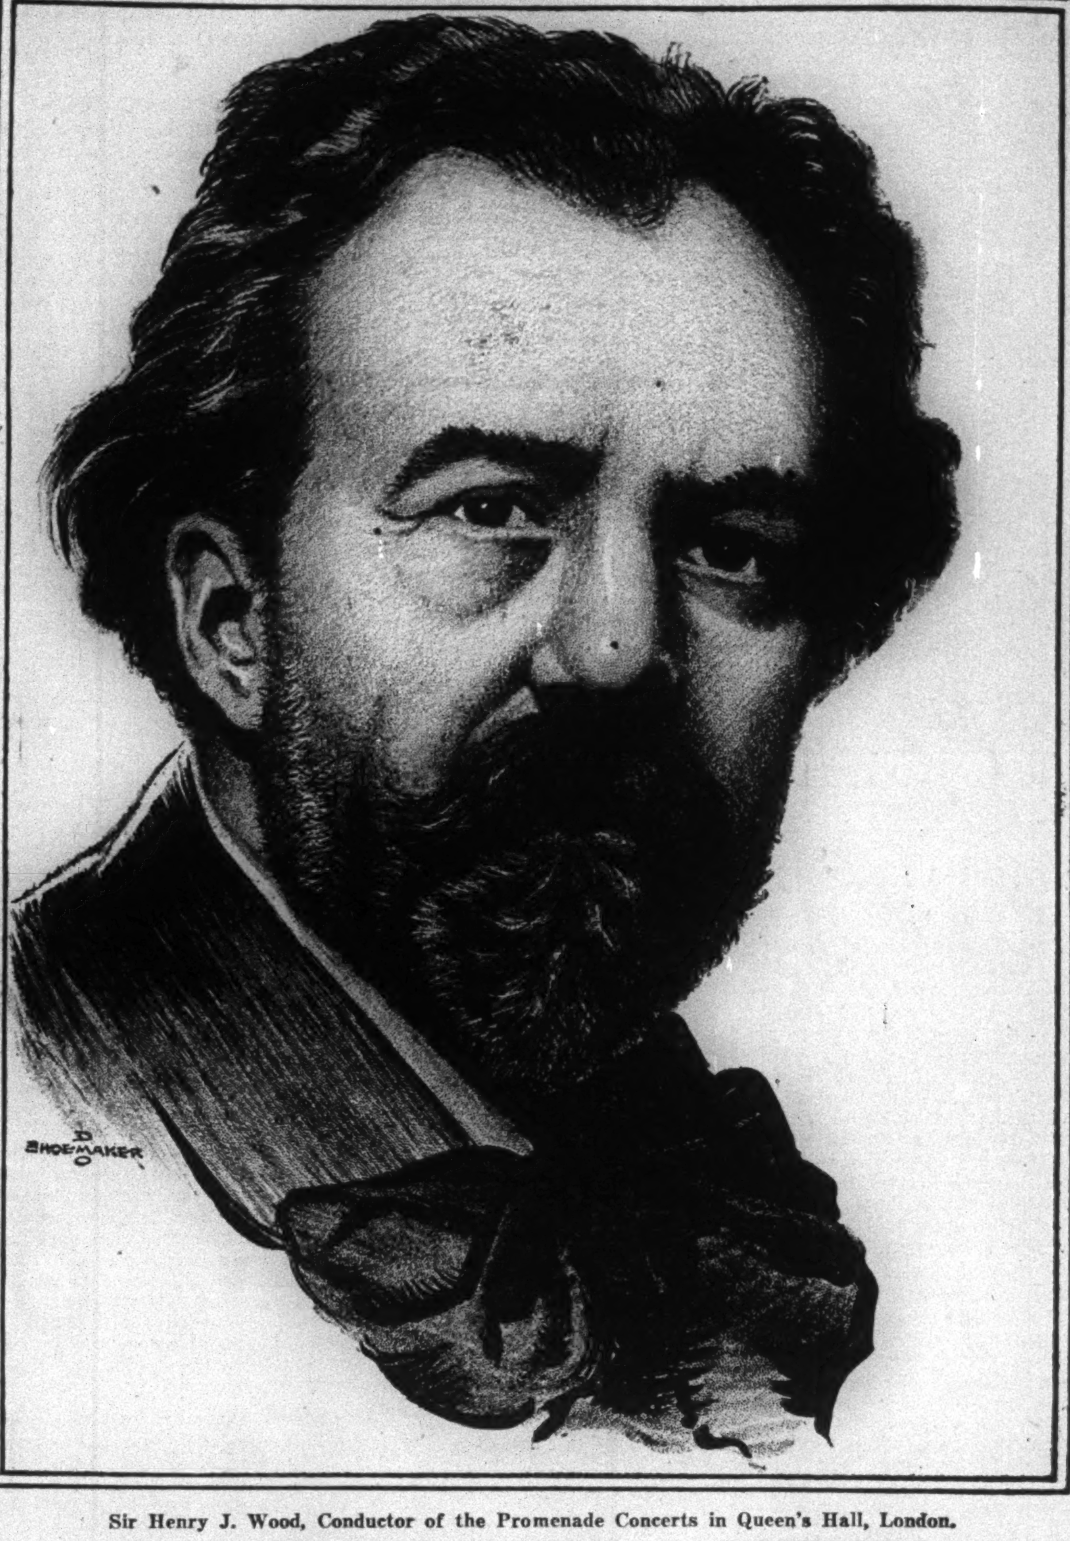
"Medical art and the unflagging care of the attedants could not save the precious life, nor was the love of his wife of avail, who stayed near the bed of the patient from the first until the last moment.

"There is no doubt that Siegfried Wagner is a sacrifice to his devotion in seeing personally through every detail of the preparations of this year's festival."

The communiqué is signed by Dr. Hermann Koerber.

BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE.

The annual Bach festival in Leipzig was held a short time ago. The program included cantatas, chamber music, a cembalo concerto and the "Passion of St. John." Bach's own cembalo, one of the modern pianoforte's predecessors, is in the collection of musical instruments at the Berlin State Academy of Music. The Gewandhaus Choral Society, which is the choir of the Thomas Church, where Bach was organist and choirmaster for many years, took part in the program. The municipal orchestra, conducted by Karl Straube, present cantor of the Thomas Church, accompanied.



Sir Henry J. Wood, Conductor of the Promenade Concerts in Queen's Hall, London.

THE LONDON "PROMS" COMMENCE

THE B. B. C. (British Broadcasting Company) Orchestra, Sir Henry J. Wood conducting, recently opened the thirty-sixth season of Promenade concerts in Queen's Hall, London. This series of concerts extends over eight weeks, the final program being given on Saturday, Oct. 4. Prominent artists who will appear as soloists with the orchestra include Myra Hess, Harriet Cohen, the English Singers, Yelly d'Aranyi, Walter Widdop, Steuart Wilson, Harold Samuel, Isolde Menges, Marian Anderson, Elly Ney, Katharine Goodson, Maurice Marechal, Felix Salmond, Nicolas Orloff, Ethel Bartlett, Rae Robertson and others.

Following the custom of previous years, each concert of the week will be devoted to a particular type of program, thus: Wagner on Monday nights, miscellaneous program on Tuesdays, Bach or Brahms on Wednesdays, British composers on Thursdays, Beethoven on Fridays and popular programs on Saturday evenings, although such works as César Franck's symphony and Dvorak's "New World" are also included.

It is interesting to note the number of modern composers of various nationalities who appear on the Tuesday and Saturday miscellaneous programs. Ravel, on the opening night of the series, was represented by his "Bolero"; Hindemith, a few days later, by his concerto for organ and orchestra, Villa-Lobos's Choros for full orchestra being given on the same program. Other contemporaneous composers, not English, whose works are to be heard during the season of Prom concerts are: Aug. 19, Leos Janacek (Wallachian Dances for orchestra), Henri Rabaud (symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne"); Aug. 23, Dukas ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"), Percy Grainger (English Dance), Delius (violin concerto); Aug. 26, Ernst Krenek (potpourri for orchestra); Aug. 30, César Franck (symphony in D minor); Sept. 2, Charpentier (aria from "Louise"); Sibelius (tone poem, "Finlandia"); Sept. 9, Max Bruch ("The Fire Cross"), Honegger (concerto for violoncello and orchestra); Sept. 13, Ernest Bloch ("Schelomo"); Sept. 16, Kodály ("Summer Evening"); Sept. 20, César Franck (symphonic poem, symphonic variations for pianoforte and orchestra); Sept. 27, Kodály (suite, "Harry János"); Sept. 30, Arthur Shepherd ("Horizons"). Of the above list of composers three are Americans—Arthur Shepherd, native born; Ernest Bloch and Percy Grainger, naturalized citizens.

The following list includes world premières, also first performances in London and England, scheduled for presentation during the season:

Aug. 19—Wallachian Dances for orchestra ....Leos Janacek
Aug. 23—English Dance for orchestra and organ ....Percy Grainger
Aug. 26—Potpourri for orchestra (Op. 54) ....Ernst Krenek
Aug. 30—Suite, "The Land." ....Elizabeth Maconchy
Sept. 4—Anacreontic Ode ....Ethel Smyth
Sept. 9—Symphony for orchestra and organ ....Marcel Dupre
Sept. 9—Concerto for violoncello and orchestra ....Honegger
Sept. 16—"Summer Evening" ....Kodály
Sept. 30—"Horizons" (four Western pieces) ....Arthur Shepherd
Oct. 2—Oboe concerto ....Eugene Goossens
Oct. 2—Pianoforte concerto ....John Ireland

Thursday evenings are given over to works by British composers mainly. As a basis for comparison with other countries, showing the opportunities afforded to native composers in England, the following programs may be of interest:

Aug. 14.

*Overture, "Portsmouth Point, ...William Walton
Benedictus from Mass in D....Ethel Smyth
Violin concerto in B minor....Elgar
Symphony No. 1, in E flat minor..Arnold Bax

*Conducted by composer.

One hundred and eighty-two church choirs which brought together about 1,200 men and boys gave a concert recently at a festival in Albert Hall, London. Dr. Sydney H. Nicholson conducted. Evensong, Stanford's "Te Deum" in B flat and processional hymns and anthems were included on the program. In the procession were the Deans of Westminster and Windsor, and the Bishops of Winchester and London. The London Daily Mail arranged the event.

The National Union of School Orchestras of London gave a concert recently at the Crystal Palace, Allen Gill conducting. With an organ and the Grenadier Guards' Band, they played "admirably," according to The Daily Telegraph.

BERLIN'S NEW MUSIC FESTIVAL

By ALFRED EINSTEIN.

BERLIN, July 25, 1930.

LAST Sunday, in these columns, there was a review of some of the principal musical departures of the "new music" festival held recently in Berlin. It was then noted that special attention had been given to the problems presented by the "aural play" which was primarily conceived for broadcast purposes, chorus music for schools and for organizations of music-loving amateurs, and finally, the "teaching-piece," a sort of dramatic cantata for use in the higher schools.

School Opera.

The "Teaching Piece" culminates in the "School Opera." This school opera, "The One Who Says 'Yes'" (Der Jasager), was not given in the 'New Music—Berlin, 1930" weeks, because its authors, the poet Bert Brecht and the composer Kurt Weill, had some disagreement a short time before with the management of the festival. This, of course, hardly concerns us, since, in any event, the work rightfully belongs to the festival.

In this "school-opera," which has been included under the term "community music," a new territory has been won, and this, in turn, has been conquered. For the school-drama with choruses, the real school operas, are really old historical concepts, which have long been in existence. Since the time of humanism and the baroque of venerable history, especially in Germany, this form has drained and exhausted all the possible material of the classical and biblical, until the blessed nineteenth century also broke away from these dramatic and creative threads.

One may say "yes" as a whole to this "Yes Sayer," as little as one agrees with the component parts. Above all, one can harbor reservations about Brecht's text, which is, at bottom, an altogether too Japanese theatre piece. A small boy goes with his teacher and some schoolmates over the mountains in order to procure medicine and directions for treatment for his sick mother. His strength deserts him at a critical point during the quick return journey home. At this juncture the "great custom" of hurling the sick and weary into the abyss comes under consideration. The question whether it is not better to turn back is, according to the custom, always vetoed by the victim himself. The youth thereupon says "yes" bravely to his death and dies for the company. I am not so sure that it does not require the highest civil courage to say "no" in such a crisis. I do know that the comrades of the youth should not bring about his death. My middle-European conscience resists this concept. However, though the material in its motivation is weak and questionable, the situations are powerful. That which attracts youth in it is its absence of sentimentality and of mere empty words, its earnestness, its hardiness and its lack of pretension.

Creative Participation.

This time Kurt Weill the musician has greatly surpassed Bert Brecht the librettist. The work is his second big lucky hit after his "Dreigroschen-Oper." The music combines the assonance of the old classic with the modern "step-rhythm." The chorus at the beginning has in it Handelian solidity and weight, though without imitating Handel. The scene where the teacher introduces himself has the clang and rhythm of the saxophone. The dialogue terminates in a trio in which one can hear as much of the archaic as of the new. The scenes in the mountains are stylized not without naturalistic characteristics—that is, they are naturalistic not without evoking oratorio style in the change from solos to trios and choruses.

The action is connected by means of closely bound musical items. There is no recitative, but simply fashioned melody, motif-bound spoken song. It is all so simple in its total aspect, so premeditated in the facility of its entrances, that it sings of itself. The harmony, which is just as sure and simple, keeps clear of any suggestion of atonality and meanderings. All the orchestral passages sound rhythmic, primitive and yet quaintly in keeping with the tonal atmosphere, by means of the union of strongly garrisoned strings plus percussion and plucked instruments. The auditor cannot resist nor evade the sincerity or the style of the impression engendered by this music.

The best part of this work is the production. The anonymous "forces of the choir of youth," the singers and instrumentalists of the Academy for Churches and School Music, have given us an example of that "involuntariness" which is characteristic of the ideal of the art of play-acting. Here was an occasion where they were not acting in a theatre nor set up to be gazed at. Every participant, from the conductor down to percussion players, "made music," just as if there were no public present; from the diminutive Charles, who played the rôle of the boy—no, who was the boy—down to the trio of the chums, the figures were living and incarnate. Youth no longer needs opera; it has something different which is better. Or perhaps some day it may demand the best, because youth, the most critical portion of the public, insists upon genuineness, absolute truth in a work, and what might be called "second naïveté" in the artist.

Electrical Music.

In this German festival there were many more things to be heard, among others burlesque phonograph records by Hindemith and Toch, "phonograph music," so to speak—not an adaptation or a reproduction, but music conceived originally and directly with the phonograph in mind. This "production," however, bordered closely on practical joking. To be taken more seriously, however, was a new electrical instrument, the "Trautonium."

The evening was a series of compliments exchanged between host and guests. The director of the State Academy of Music, Georg Schuenemann, who gave us details in a smooth and meaty introduction concerning the activities of the "Radio-Research-Foundation," established two years ago in his institute, stressed the need of cooperation between musicians and technical engineers. He also introduced the lecturer, Friedrich Trautwein, inventor of the new electrical instrument, the "Trautonium," which looked down forbiddingly from the platform in various models within the box-like form of a radio-receiver.

As a harbinger of future scientific importance, Dr. Trautwein's invention seems more significant than as music. The instrument, while opening up many undreamed-of possibilities in the production and change of tone-color, has a long way to go, however, before it will be a musical instrument. It is operated very simply by the hand of the player, somewhat as in the Theremin instrument, where the right hand regulates the tones and the left the dynamics.

Dr. Trautwein selected one of the many "solutions," a "keyboard instrument." Here, however, the player had at his disposition a sort of stringed cylinder or flat, continuous manual with articulated points of contact, both the pitch and volume being regulated with one and the same finger. Chords and polyphonic passages are also conceivable, but such music was not given to us by the six performers on the platform, among whom were to be noted Paul Hindemith and Walter Goehr. The music played did not go beyond three-part polyphony on three separate instruments. A couple of compositions by Hindemith and Genzmers exhibited the powers of the new instruments and showed rich tone quality, tenderness, distant effects and rapid figuration. This last is what Theremin could not do, being always limited to cantabile. The tone, however, is piercing and impure, except for a few chords of magical quality. The figured passages come out unwieldy and in "amalgamation." "The Great Tone" is not genuinely round and full, but megaphonic and mammoth-like. It is an "unhuman" instrument. Is it really an enrichment for the "New Music" to stress the simplification of color when this very "new music" is returning, as it must, to humanity and human feelings?

GERMAN FESTIVALS.

THE following outline of current and future musical activities in Germany and Austria presents many important festivals, presentations and courses for visitors which are being offered in these countries this Summer and Autumn.

From Bach to Beethoven.

July-September—Augsburg. Chamber music in the old Golden Gallery of the Town Hall. Information: Verkehrsbuero, Rathaus, Augsburg.

Mozart Festival.

July-September—Stuttgart. Concerts in the courtyard of the old castle. Information: Stuttgarter Handelshof, Gewerbehalle Platz 1, Stuttgart; also, Rudolf Ritter, Wiederholdstrasse 24, Stuttgart.

Studeny Quartet.

July-September—Herrenchiemsee, Upper Bavaria. Chamber music and illumination of the castle. Information: H. Studeny, Tuerkenstrasse 97, Munich.

Berber Quartet.

July-September—Munich. Concerts in the courtyard of the residence. Information: Sueddeutsche Konzertdirektion Otto Bauer, Wurzerstrasse 16, Munich.

Strauss and Pfitzner Festivals.

End of August—Munich. Performances of "Rosenkavalier" (Strauss conducting) and "Palestrina" (Pfitzner conducting). Information: Amtliches Bayerisches Reisebuero, Promenadenplatz 16, Munich.

Havemann Quartet.

September—Coburg. Second Modern Chamber Music Festival. Information: Stadtverkehrsamt, Coburg.

Classical Music.

Sept. 3, 5, 7—Baden-Baden. Information: Staedtische Musikdirektion, Baden-Baden.

Music for Radio.

End of September—Munich. Conference. Information: Musikabteilung des Zentralinstituts fuer Erziehung und Unterricht, Potsdamer Strasse 120, Berlin W. 35.

German Conference on School Music.

Autumn—Cassel or Koenigsberg. Information: Musikabteilung des Zentralinstituts fuer Erziehung und Unterricht, Potsdamer Strasse 120, Berlin W. 35.

Annual Festival of Association of German Musicians and Music Teachers.

Oct. 2-6—Dresden. Lectures, opera, concerts, choral works, chamber music and sacred music. Conductors: Busch, Scheinpflug, Pembaur. Information: Reichsverband Deutscher Tonkuenstler und Musiklehrer, Zietenstrasse 27, Berlin W. 57.

Bruckner Festival.

Oct. 22—Munich. Under the direction of Franz Schalk in connection with the meeting of the International Bruckner Society. Information: Amtliches Bayerisches Reisebuero, Promenadenplatz 16, Munich.

THE MOSCOW OLYMPIAD

ALTHOUGH the rôle of music in the big theatre Olympiad, held recently in Moscow and participated in by about 1,000 performers from all corners of the Soviet Union, was supposed to be a subordinate one, its effect grew rapidly with the development of the affair itself, writes Eugen Braudo in the Moskauer Rundschau. He continues as follows:

"There was hardly a theatrical performance without music. The art of music organized the dramatic action, it rhythmatized it, it gave it the ringing emotional background. Most of the theatrical performances given during the Olympiad were by no means purely dramatic art. In the national theatres it was always a matter of a musical-dramatic production.

"This powerful musical influence gave rise to an interesting contradiction. This contradiction may be labeled 'Ethnography or Active Art.' It's this way. The peoples who were freed politically and culturally by the November [1917] revolution have an almost passionate interest in their national music. This interest is developing along two basic lines. In the first place, the minority nationalities who, before the November revolution, were completely deprived of the right to a 'history,' just now are greatly attached to their musical historical development. This 'historism' is an absolutely necessary development among the national minorities. In the second place, almost all peoples yearn for the kind of music that mirrors revolutionary fact.

"This 'historism,' a hypertrophy of the ethnographically historical elements in the people's art, contains many dangers, the most important of which are an exaggerated nationalism and the cultivation of former court art. On the other hand, it takes much longer to learn the language of music than talking and reading. This deepens the differentiation of the values of musical feelings. It often happens that new words are linked with old melodies, as is the case with the Uzbeks, Tartars, et al. Nevertheless, the new texts also bring new dynamics into the musical presentation and explain the melodies. A new unity is born which exercises a particular influence upon the listener through a revolutionizing text.

"The musical part of the Olympiad opened a new world to the Moscow public. To most of the listeners the absolutely inexhaustible wealth of rhythmic forms, the powerful structure of the pieces drawn by the Eastern musicians from their very primitive instruments, came as a big surprise. For instance, some of the great Uzbek dances are built upon sixty rhythmic forms. Some of the peoples, like the Turkomans, have musicians of the highest virtuosity, a virtuosity unattainable by the most skillful players of Europe.

"The Olympiad was a most potent antidote for the deeply rooted prejudices regarding the music of the East. It showed that the melting chromatic, generally associated with the idea of the musical East, has nothing in common with the native art of the Eastern peoples. Of the hundreds of musical pieces presented during the Olympiad hardly ten were in line with the traditional conception of Eastern melody.

"Nevertheless, there is a real crisis in the people's art. The peoples of Central Asia, of the Caucasus, of the region of the steppes, are now experiencing a swift cultural reconstruction. The work of rearranging public life is being put through with feverish energy. Ethnographic art, old morals and customs, are being overhauled by life's tempo. The new ideas demand active, contemporaneous art. It is for the national artists to solve the serious problem of how to bring the traditional, national language of music into harmony with the new content. The Olympiad gave a quite definite answer. The new art uses a national language with an international content. This national language is based upon the actions of the people, upon the living, affirmative elements of the popular songs."

FOREIGN NOTES.

The Bergen symphony, which has been under private control since 1765, has celebrated its first decade under government supervision. Three festival concerts were given and music by every well-known Norwegian composer received a hearing. Harald Heide and Sverre Jordan conducted. Christian Sinding was presented with the Harmoniens Verdienstmedaille, which was struck originally in honor of the society's first conductor, Niels Haslund, the great grandfather of Edvard Grieg.

Three "pastoral fêtes of ancient music" were recently presented by Wanda Landowska with the assistance of pupils of her school at St. Leu-la-Forêt near the forest of Montmorency, France. Several concertos of Bach for two and three harpsichords were played and a cantata by Buxtehude, Bach and Tunder were sung, in addition to works seldom played by modern orchestras, of Frescobaldi, Handel, Couperin, Scarlatti and Rameau.

The festival is dedicated to music of the past and is given each year by Mme. Landowska.

Igor Markewitch's new cantata for soprano solo, male choir and orchestra, with words by Jean Cocteau, has been received warmly in Paris. The Russian composer, though only 18 years of age, writes "with astonishing mastery of technique in composition, and a sense of form remarkable in so youthful a musician."

Honegger's "Judith" with Lydia Wyrian has just been heard for the first time in Leningrad. Klimoff conducted.

THE DANCE: PHYSICAL TRAINING

Some of the Modern Creators Whose Systems Have Contributed Much to the Strength of the Movement as It Is Today

By JOHN MARTIN.

IN writing several years ago of the German dance as it appeared to him at the Congress in Essen, André Levinson, the distinguished Franco-Russian authority on classic dancing, remarked that he found a complete lack of recognition on the part of the German dancers of the two people who, in his opinion, were the real creators of the modern dance as it is now being practiced in Central Europe. These two people were Isadora Duncan and Emile Jaques-Dalcroze.

There is certainly much to be said in support of M. Levinson's statement; indeed, except for her courage in attacking the classic ballet, Isadora Duncan finds little adulation in the German field, and Jaques-Dalcroze is rarely even so much as mentioned. But there is reason for believing that Levinson's view of the number of people who had important shares in the creation of the new dance is somewhat conservative. Undoubtedly Dalcroze and Duncan were the leading outside forces in the modernization of the ballet as it blossomed under the guiding hand of Diaghileff; but the case with Germany was not at all the same thing.

The Germans have been conspicuous for their lack of contribution to the classic ballet, and it is only natural that their new dance should receive its stimulus from quite different sources. It was, as a matter of fact, a rebellion against the musical basis of the eurythmics of Dalcroze and the "interpretations" of Duncan that gave Rudolf von Laban such a hold on the dance with his theories of movement and of musicless dancing. Indeed, so strong was the wave of anti-romanticism that swept across the scene in the years just after the war, when the new dance had its beginnings, that it is most profitable to search for its origins in fields not only far apart from music but even remote from any art connotations.

Two survivals of this early period bear witness to the truth of such a theory. One is the name "physical culture dancing," which was once the general designation for the whole movement, and which is gradually disappearing as the art aspects of the dance are made more and more important; and the other is the fact that physical technique, muscular control, balance, strength and such considerations are developed to a point so immeasurably beyond that of esthetic form and value. One must look elsewhere than to Duncan and Dalcroze, who were artists and adventurers in art, to find the sources of a movement which was, in a way, almost anti-artistic in its earliest stages.

CERTAINLY among the list of creators of the modern movement the name of Rudolf Bode must be included. His work as a physical culturist of the new school is known and honored throughout Central Europe, and his teachings have become in large measure part and parcel of the teachings of the dance studios, though he is not a dancer or a teacher of dancing. It is interesting to speculate on the situation of the modern dance if Bode's collaboration with Dalcroze had been established as he wanted it to be.

Before the great institute was built at Hellerau for Dalcroze he and Bode worked together, for a certain amount of physical training was recognized by Dalcroze as requisite for the best results of his method. He was zealous for the musical aspects of his eurythmics, however—perhaps more in those early days than he has since grown to be, what with the spread of his theories throughout educational fields in general and dance fields in particular, and he feared that too close an alliance with physical culture would divert the whole trend of his work into dancing. Hence the rupture with Bode and the consequent narrowing, one surmises, of Dalcroze's potentially great influence on the art of dancing.

Even without Bode, however, or some one to take his place, Dalcroze might have taken the leadership in the German dance but for the unfortunate consequences of his actions during the war. Though his school had been built in part by the city of Dresden and in part by private German capital, he was not, and could scarcely have been expected to be, a German himself in sympathies, background or tastes. But when he signed his name, as one of a number of artists, to a round-robin protesting against the sacking of Louvain, he committed a tactical blunder which sealed forever his fate as an influence in German art. His great enterprise at Hellerau had to be abandoned after only three years of activity, and he went to Switzerland to carry on under far less advantageous conditions.

CERTAINLY when one now visits the beautiful Dalcroze Institute in Hellerau—used in part as a training school for social workers, but with its most important part, the huge production hall, unused—one is moved to profound regret that an establishment so ideally conceived and executed should be allowed to lie practically idle as a monument to what might have been. Not only the dance but the theatre as well might easily have found a new birth here.

But even with the past as it unalterably is, the influences of Dalcroze are to be seen today in the German dance to some extent. For one thing, Mary Wigman was a graduate pupil of his school. Though she is not a passionate disciple of his method, she nevertheless could not possibly discard in its entirety an influence so strong.

For another thing, after Dalcroze left Germany the work was carried on for a time at the Hellerau school by some of his students and teachers, chiefly Christine Baer-Frissell, an American woman. Eventually she found it advisable to break away from the old surroundings, but under her direction there has occurred in a small way something of what might have taken place in a larger way if Bode had been admitted into the desired collaboration with Dalcroze. At any rate, in her Hellerau-Laxenburg school near Vienna, she has developed a training system for dancers which makes wide use of the principles of Dalcroze and which has had no small influence in the German field.

Throughout the rank and file of dancers, as well as in these special cases, there is to be seen a hint of the theory of eurythmics, though in a state of arrested development. The most elementary aspects of the subject have apparently been accepted as an end in themselves, and the musical condition of the whole dance is deplorable, partly in consequence of this. The relation of Dalcroze to the German dance is therefore a tragically unrealized one.

With the close of the war, the physical culture movement, quite apart from any consideration of dancing, leaped to unprecedented popularity. The interest of the nation apparently rose to extremes of devotion to health and hygiene. On the one hand, cults of doubtful value in the eyes of many sprang up here and there, advocating the wholesale discarding of clothes; on the other hand, the man in the street took to cross-country hiking, accompanied by his wife and family and their faithful walking-sticks.

IN the midst of this craze, it is not unnatural that a careful, one might almost say an inspired, system of corrective gymnastics like that of Dr. Bess Mensendieck (also an American woman), should have received the attention of the more thoughtful. To omit her name from those of the contributors to the German dance would be inadmissible, although she has never been in any way directly concerned with dancing and lays no claim to credit for having influenced its development. Her system, nevertheless, is included in more than one dancing school curriculum, and the highest tribute is paid to her name by many prominent dancers.

There have undoubtedly been other methods and other leaders who have also played a part in building up the tremendous background of physical training from which the dance emerges in high relief; for in the wide range of its activities there are to be found endless variations in theory and practice. Indeed, to underestimate this phase of the subject is to warp the perspective on the entire German dance, for it was primarily a physical thing.

In the transformation of this physical basis to an art basis, other names must be added to the list of "creators," which is already growing lengthy. This period included the relating of merely muscular movement to kinetic significance, and here is where the rank and file of the German dancers got decidedly off the track, so to speak. By attempting to associate movement with expression of some sort, they fell backward into the very pit from which they had just succeeded in extricating themselves, only this time they did not realize they were in it. We find much agitation over inner feeling and all the shibboleths of romanticism again in motion, the difference being that now feelings must be sinister, ugly, grotesque, in order to differentiate them from the sentimentalism of yesterday. If there has seemingly been something of a vicious circle here traversed, the end is not yet; and in the trend toward the theatre the modern dance is finding itself actually modern in the sense that modern music and modern painting are modern.

In that period when movement as muscle action was being experimented with as a possible medium for art, the great name was undoubtedly that of Laban. He not only paved the way for "expressionism" by his studies of movements in relation to character and mental qualities, but he also made certain highly important and fundamental analyses of space as the medium of the dancer. In view of the scope and timeliness of his work, it is little wonder that he is considered somewhat in the light of a father of the modern dance.

BUT Laban as an artist leaves room for complaint. He was merely the theorist. The artist who first put the elements of the German dance together in such manner as to create esthetic overtones was Mary Wigman, and though in point of time much was accomplished before she came on the scene, nevertheless, in listing the creators of the modern dance, her name must lead all the rest. For where they did the planning and provided the material, she supplied the magic spark that set their fuel ablaze.

Thus when one begins to account for the origins of the modern movement, such an army of originators marches into the accounting that one must needs withdraw in some dismay. Here, for example, much ground has been covered in point of time, but in point of space only Germany has been considered.

What about the modern dance movement in America? Has it been influenced by the physical culture movement? Have Laban and Wigman, Bode and Mensendieck helped to shape its course? Presumably not to any great extent, since none of the prominent American dancers has had any contact whatsoever with any of them. Yet, strangely enough, the prominent American dancers are with few exceptions creating an idiom which bears a strong relation to the idiom of the German dancers.

Does anybody actually merit the title of creator in a movement which spreads as this one does over so much unrelated territory? Or is there something in the air that all the creative dancers of the world happen to be breathing at the same time? Those who like to run down clues to their ultimate solution will no doubt choose to believe in personal creators; and for their edification and delight let it be said that there is an endless mass of material for them to work with.

GOLDMAN CONCERTS CLOSE

THE tenth and last week of the Goldman Band concerts under the direction of Edwin Franko Goldman will include an Irish-Scotch and several miscellaneous programs. The closing concert of the season will take place on the Mall in Central Park next Sunday evening, Aug. 24. The closing concert of the New York University series will be given on Saturday evening, Aug. 23. Soloists for the week will be Cora Frye, soprano, and Del Staigers, cornetist.

Complete programs for the week are as follows:

Two performances of opera will be given at the Convention Hall in Asbury Park, according to announcement made by the Cosmopolitan Opera Association. The operas are "Faust," to be given on Friday evening, and "Rigoletto" on Saturday, and singers engaged for these performances are Helene Adler, Alice Kurkjian and Maud Webber, sopranos; David Dorlini and Albert Deichler, tenors; Ciro De Ritis, Louis Dallemolle and R. Chan, baritones, and Alfredo Valenti, basso. Vito Mascato will conduct both productions and Bernard Cantor will be stage director.

The Steel Pier Grand Opera Company will present Thomas's "Mignon" this evening in the ballroom of the Steel Pier at Atlantic City. The opera will be sung in English, with the following cast: Elda Vettori, Melvena Passmore, Judson House, Henri Scott and Rhys-Rees Morgan.

The Free Open Air Grand Opera Company will present "Rigoletto" Thursday evening at the Starlight Stadium, East 177th Street. Mario Valle will sing the title rôle, Giuseppe Barsotti the part of the Duke.

W. A. Goldsworthy, organist and choirmaster of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, New York, will be the guest artist this afternoon at the seventh of the series of free concerts given under the auspices of the Westchester County Recreation Commission, at the Westchester County Centre, White Plains.

CHAUTAUQUA SEASON CLOSES.

CHAUTAUQUA'S second season of opera will come to a close with tomorrow evening's performance of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." The leading rôles will be sung by Milo Miloradovich and Charles Kullman, and the production is under the direction of Albert Stoessel.

SPIRITUALS AT STADIUM

ALBERT COATES concludes his three weeks' guest engagement with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this evening, at which time he will conduct an all-Russian program, consisting of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Glinka's overture, "Russian and Ludmilla," Stravinsky's suite, "Petrouschka," and Scriabin's "Poëme de L'Extase." For the two final weeks of the season the orchestra will again be under the direction of Willem van Hoogstraten, who returns tomorrow evening.

The Hall Johnson Negro Choir, conducted by Hall Johnson, will be heard Tuesday and Wednesday, marking the third successive Summer engagement of this group at the Lewisohn Stadium. Mr. Johnson has divided his program into two groups of four songs each: "Mos' Done Travelin'," "Deep River," "Great Camp Meetin'" and "Ol' Ark's a-Moverin'" during the first half of the program, and "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," "Water Boy" and "Gimme Yo' Han'" at the end. In addition to the program presented by the choir, the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. van Hoogstraten, will contribute works by Nicolai, Dukas, Berlioz and Strauss on Tuesday, and by Rossini, Grieg, Langley and Brahms on Wednesday.

First Stadium performances of the last week but one of the season, in addition to Langley's "Song of Youth," will be Bruckner's Eighth symphony in C minor on Thursday and three pieces for orchestra—Rhapsody Espagnole, Trianon and Scherzo Espagnole—by Charles Maduro, Saturday. Mr. Maduro was born and educated in Curaçao, Dutch West Indies, and his works have been played by the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic and the New York Chamber Music Society, as well as by prominent artists.

Anna Duncan will make her annual appearance at the Stadium in a program of dances next Monday and Tuesday, Aug. 25 and 26. Complete programs for the current week follow:

RECORDED MUSIC: 'A SONATA'

Thibaud and Cortot in a Masterly Version of the Caesar Franck Chamber Work—Other Recent Releases

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

ENGLISH H. M. V. is said to have some sort of a guiding principle reading to the effect that "when in doubt use the big three." Under this title have been placed Casals, Cortot and Thibaud. Apparently, Victor feels somewhat the same in the matter, for, with a few sensational and long-expected releases up its sleeve, we have Cortot and Thibaud figuring in a Masterpiece album (No. 81) for the second time in three months. They follow up the Kreutzer with César Franck's sonata in A, a replacement of an existing pre-electrical set, conveniently arranged so that each of the four records carries a full movement.

There is a method in this, for the album might easily have been overlooked had it been part of the larger monthly releases of the Fall and Winter, whereas at this time it is more than probable that the sonata will receive wider notice and more of us will make the acquaintance of what is probably the most typical of Franck's works.

This is another case in which one is tempted to take refuge in superlatives. Chamber music, as the mails disclose, is in a peculiar position. It is the only department to develop active enemies among gramophone owners, who have asked for light as to why the recording companies waste time with it when they have such wide unexplored fields for them. These four records form a more fitting answer than any we could devise. In the present form this sonata may be obtained in parts. It is suggested that any one honestly open to conviction obtain the second movement (allegro) by itself. When the inevitable charm commences to work, the fourth movement should be enough to settle the matter, and the remaining two are guaranteed to follow the others home, their tails high in the air. It will be in playing the complete set through that final conversion is bound to occur. Apart from the delights of the individual movements, Franck has achieved an extraordinary unity in his welding of the whole.

THERE has always been some question as to Cortot's recording tone. The microphone is not yet kind to the more subtle pianists, and the tub-thumpers are still able to score well above their merits. In this case, however, there are signs of justice. To those who test the set in the usual way—starting at the first side and throwing up their hands in despair before the work is under way—a warning might be given that the earlier parts of the first movement are not in any way a criterion of the remainder.

With the exception of Solvejg's song, one might win wagers on the identity of the parts of Grieg's Peer Gynt suite, No. 2. Yet with each hearing, the wonder at the greater popularity of the first suite increases. Commencing with the "Bridal Escort" covering the wedding feast and Peer Gynt's elopement with the bride, it covers the Arabian Dance of his travels, depicts his return and closes with Solvejg's well-known cradle song. The suite is now issued by Columbia on two records in the Masterworks series, without album. These are repressings from a set made in England about eighteen months ago by Georg Schneevoigt, sometime conductor at Helsingfors, and the New Queen's Hall Light Orchestra. The recording is, as usual from this source, very faithful. At times there are evidences of overamplification, but, in the main, the tone is excellent.

WITH its recording of samples of the work of last year's Schubert Memorial Contest winners, Victor is identifying itself with a worthy bit of missionary work. It may be remembered that the same opportunity to have specimens of their skill circulated to the world at large was given the successful entrants of the previous year. This time we have a recording from Phyllis Kraeuter ('cello) and Ruth Posselt (violin). Both young ladies keep the honors at home by selecting an accompanist from her own family.

Miss Posselt's choices (Victor 4184) are a "Poem" of Fibich (in Kubelik's arrangement) and Wieniawski's "Sielanka," Opus 12, No. 1, which between them manage to give her an opportunity for display in various lights. The "Poem" is an affair of the heart, with a touch of tragedy in it, during which Miss Posselt comes dangerously near to dropping sugared tears—but not quite. The reverse is something entirely different, a matter of acrobatics and fireworks calling for far sterner qualities. With an eye to the future, it is gratifying to note that the young lady gives a much better account of herself here than in the simpler and more sentimental piece.

Neither of Miss Kraeuter's contributions (Victor 4185) is so ambitious as her fellow-prize-winner's second selection. They are Wilhelm Popper's "Impromptu," Opus 6, and David Popper's "Fond Recollections," Opus 64, No. 1. In them she confidently displays a rich, even tone and considerable promise.

COLUMBIA and Victor each carry a piano record on their latest lists. In the case of the former the enigmatic Cyril Scott plays two ingenious trifles of his own composition (Columbia 2228), "Valse Scherzando" and "Water Wagtail," a descriptive piece giving his impression of the activities of this bird. These are little more than suggestive trifles neatly worked out and played in keeping. There is nothing particular about the recording except that it shows occasional metallic signs of overamplification.

Victor's disk is of the perennial and well-tried Moiseivitch, who attacks Godowsky's paraphrased potpourri from "Fledermaus." No apology need be made for the original, and Godowsky has published a very definite confession of faith in the matter of piano adaptations. Applying his theories to the melodious treasury Johann Strauss evolved for an entirely different purpose, he has set a tremendous task for any pianist to tackle. Moiseivitch is well up to his average recording level, and the technical department has acquitted itself admirably.

ONE feels thankful to the trio of correspondents who felt sufficiently outraged to question the remarks made in this column about Albert Coates's version of Siegfried's Funeral March. Any excuse for bringing this disk to the attention of gramophone owners is more than welcome. Careful consideration only further convinces one that the substitution in the American set of the Coates record for the Muck version was entirely justified. Siegfried's Funeral March, or apotheosis, that majestic résumé of the hero's origins and achievements, is a monumental dirge, barbaric and sublime.

Without attempting to question Muck's authority, it is immediately obvious that his record as compared with the other tells but half the story. The essential qualities are there, but curiously diluted. The barbaric element deals rather with tom-toms, loin-cloths and colored rags, whereas Coates has managed to express the elementary savagery common to us all. In that first climax the sustained woodwinds beneath the staccato brass and wandering strings strike a note of universal tragedy. Nothung flashes out almost to be seen, and the second announcement of Siegfried's own theme, sailing proudly and nobly, makes us forget what an arrant ass the superman actually was. Here is a genuine expression of tremendous tragedy which leaves us regretting the days of the gods. The Coates record is certainly among the three best pieces put out for the gramophone by any laboratory.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

REGARDING the price of first-rate records, I should like to make a point that seems to be little considered. One's idea of cost and economy run in strange lines. Somehow the same persons who do not hesitate about a large lump sum for a single desirable but expensive object will feel a strong sense of extravagance about piecemeal purchases such as those of records must be. A good many years ago I paid $800 for a pianola piano. This initial investment was more than a splendid collection of first-rate records representative of every phase of great music would cost, and yet I, like correspondents you quote, can scarcely overcome a sense of extravagance in investing in such records. And a phonograph of the improved types, capable of playing such records in a way to bring out their values, can be bought for a trifle.

For many years it was the custom of families to pay hundreds of dollars for pianos that went unused or were largely used for cheap or ill-played music. Contrasted with such purchases, the expense of an investment in high class records that are capable of giving a comprehensive idea of the whole sweep of musical accomplishment and an intimate sense of musical history does not loom so large. The trouble, it seems to me, lies in the fact that the capabilities and worth of good records are not yet fully recognized. A silly superciliousness about them on the part of musicians and others who are ignorant of what has been accomplished by recording contributes toward this false sense of their being an extravagant luxury.

Some of my friends make pilgrimages to Bethlehem, Pa., to hear the Bach B minor mass. Recently I heard a splendid set of records of this mass (as produced in London). This would seem to most persons to be an "expensive" set, yet it costs a little less than $30, or about the railroad fare one way to Bethlehem from my home city. And records are making available to us music that it used to take a journey to Baireuth, Germany, to hear (some of it never heard even now in the Metropolitan Opera House). When you consider that for an investment of $1,000 in a phonograph and records one can gain a knowledge of music that used to take years of expensive traveling to acquire, the most costly of present-day records seem ridiculously cheap. And they are much cheaper than the old inadequate records. Not that I should not like to see them cheap enough to be as available as the dollar reprints of the literary classics, but let us value the blessings we have.

ADOLPH SCHMUCK.

MUSIC NOTES FROM OTHER LANDS

A collection of Negro melodies gathered by Dr. Stephen Chauvet among the natives of French possessions in Africa will be published by the Société d'éditions Geographiques in Paris. The music is arranged for flute, banjo and tom-tom.

The fifteenth anniversary of the death of Offenbach will be celebrated with performances of his most popular works at the Theater an der Wien, in Vienna.

A rare copy of the first score of Wagner's "Lohengrin," with a preface addressed to Franz Liszt, was presented to the museum of Königsberg. Wagner was conductor of the orchestra at the Königsberg Theater at the time he met and married his first wife, Minna Planer.

A hitherto unknown composition for piano by Donizetti was recently discovered in the possession of Baron Luigi Sava at Naples. The work was written when the composer was 40 years old, shortly after the death of his daughters, and is an expression of grief and melancholy. The words were written by an ancestor of the present owner of the composition.

A festival in honor of the French composer Gustave Charpentier was recently held at Fresnay-sur-Sarthe. The composer appeared to conduct his "Coronation of the Muse" in an outdoor theatre. Several hundred musicians and singers interpreted the work and several thousand natives of the province attended. An address in admiration of the composer was made by Georges Ricou, director of the Opéra-Comique of Paris.

A French viewpoint of the development of music in this country was recently printed in the newspaper Figaro of Paris. The writer, Marc Logé, remarks that the recent establishment of a chair of musicology at Cornell University, and the popularity of the concerts for young persons given by Ernest Schelling, indicate an increasing interest in music by Americans.

CHARLOT'S LATEST WORK

Unites Characteristics That Are Classic and Modern—His Show at the Art Centre

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

ANTICIPATING the important exhibition of Mexican art coming here this Fall after its first showing in Mexico City, the Art Centre has been rearranging and extending the already notable collections in its Mexican room. Paintings and lithographs by Jean Charlot form an especially interesting feature, as this extraordinary artist has developed within the last two or three years a style both subtle and primitive, and possessed of an emotional force at which his early work rarely even hinted; of which his complex personality never even whispers to those who know him as a bright young man with an unimpressive cheerfulness of aspect.

Anita Brenner's recent book, "Idols Behind Altars," gives a light but vivid sketch of this elusive personality covering an enduring structure of hard thinking, close study and analysis, penetrating observation and profound appreciation of monumental simplicity. Born in Paris, Charlot arrived in Mexico in 1921, after having worked for Poiret, won prizes for abstract sculpture and woodcuts, served in the war, "a gamin artillery Lieutenant," and won insignia of honor.

In Mexico he did woodcuts, illustrated poems, wrote "neatly scholastic reports" of Mexican art for Parisian and Mexican periodicals, went with Rivera to the Secretariat, where he instructed the masons on the preparation of walls for true fresco, painted backgrounds and details on these walls and three panels of his own, one of which had to give way to a large composition by Rivera; went on painting monumentally after wall space was exhausted, and added to his larger works a series of "very small, very dark, very simple" pictures recording his explorations and esthetic experiments; became art editor of a magazine devoted to Mexican art and customs; copied Maya frescoes and bas-reliefs for the archaeological staff of the Carnegie Institution at Chichen-Itza, Yucatan; proved himself an authority on Maya art to the archaelogists and worked "so skillfully and uniquely under the blinding Yucatan sun that the head of the expedition pronounced him the discovery of the season" and retained him on the staff. His work was done with the "serious preoccupation of a very bright, modest child."

In New York he is "pleased to look like a tooth-paste salesman" and to amuse himself with 5-cent magazines, tabloids, crime tales and movies. Here he feels that he belongs legitimately to the place and the art in whose new life he feels at home.

FROM the work at the Art Centre you would guess neither the range of his variety nor his ability to camouflage his thought and feeling. In a beautiful landscape he shows, to be sure, a delicate liveliness of color and an unhackneyed treatment of form that could not have originated in a mind of monotonous habit or a temperament heavy in mood; and in a lithograph of native workmen carrying on their tasks in connection with the Yucatan excavations his brilliant stylization based on realism and the strangeness of his untrivial humor reveal not only the quality but the charm of his attitude toward art. But most of the lithographs are compressed into the fixed ritual of native shapes, gestures, poses.

Nor does the monotony of these distress him. His own description of his reaction to them is given and speaks for itself. He found the Mexico of social gayety and sophistication appalling. He was shown the National Theatre, the most popular actress, many "too-white young girls with enormously high heels." And they showed him "gentlemen with false collars."

"One day," says Charlot, "I went out upon the streets at 6 o'clock in the morning. At 6 o'clock in morning fair ladies are in garage and their automobiles are still asleep. For this reason I could look upon the true countenance of this city so covered with ornament throughout the day that one can hardly recognize her. Deserted, the residence sections look like a music hall after the performance, but in any other part among the low, cubic, painted houses, beautiful beings people the streets, there are numberless Ladies of Guadalupe. They follow one foot with the other noiselessly, and ancient beauty is reborn.

"Put a chic woman beside one of the virgins of the Parthenon, and that will be a sight to burst with laughter or weep with shame; any one of these Indians is a sister of that ancient. It is the same posture, the same gesture, the trace of the foot on the ground is the same, as is the manner of walking, the foot always horizontal and adhering to the earth like a hand. And when they come out of early mass! Wide skirts, folds of drapery, is not this the very rhythm of the Panathenae? At first sight they are entirely the color of the dust; it seems as if flesh and worn clothing had fused in this gray which is extreme poverty and humility. When the eye becomes accustomed and the soul also, this rebel race discovers to loving observation the beauty of its weaves and of its flesh."

IN the phrase "loving observation" lies the key to Charlot's treatment of Mexican subjects. Spain and France contributed to his mingled strain of race, but, as always, one element predominates, and his art in its richer manifestations is Mexican, and his art assumes for his purpose a rude force that emanates as much from his own soul as from the material of his pictures—inevitably.

One must look to it for any true understanding of this young man, "feather tongued" and boyish, whose mind is filled with ancient knowledge.

Summer Activities Out of Town

THE second exhibition of the Summer season has opened in the art gallery at Rockport, Mass. The jury of selections was composed of A. T. Hibbard, Marian P. Sloane, Yarnall Abbott, W. Lester Stevens and Maurice Compris. A one-man show of paintings by A. F. Levinson is also being held in Rockport.

An exhibition will be held Aug. 20 and 21 at the Lake Hopatcong Yacht Club, Hopatcong, N. J. It will consist of work by artists living in the immediate vicinity. Exhibitors number about seventy-five. The executive committee: Henry Sanford Northrop, Winter W. Myers, Mrs. Roscoe Hulbert and Mrs. Karl R. Schuster.

The eighth annual exhibition held by the Kent Art Association at Kent, Conn., will remain open until Sept. 1.

Recent paintings by Dorothy Byard are being shown by the Darien Guild of the Seven Arts at Darien, Conn., until Aug. 30.

George Wright has been exhibiting pastels and etchings at the Westport Antique Shop, Westport, Conn.

The twenty-ninth annual exhibition of the Lyme Art Association is now in progress in the attractive gallery at Lyme, Conn. It will remain open through Sept. 7.

Work by a group of Wilton artists may be seen in the Town Hall of Wilton, Conn., through Monday, Aug. 25. The hours are from 3 to 6 P. M.

Artists living in and about Manchester, Vt., will be ready to open their new exhibition Aug. 25. These Manchester exhibitions grow increasingly important from year to year. This is an earnest group, containing several artists of prominence and many with exceptional talents.

At Stockbridge, Mass., an art show will open Sept. 12, continuing through Oct. 5.

Decorative screens by LeRoy Daniel MacMorris, the young American artist who recently completed murals for the much discussed Pompeian swimming pool on the Long Island estate of H. H. Rogers, will be shown in the Cushing Memorial Gallery at Newport until Aug. 29.

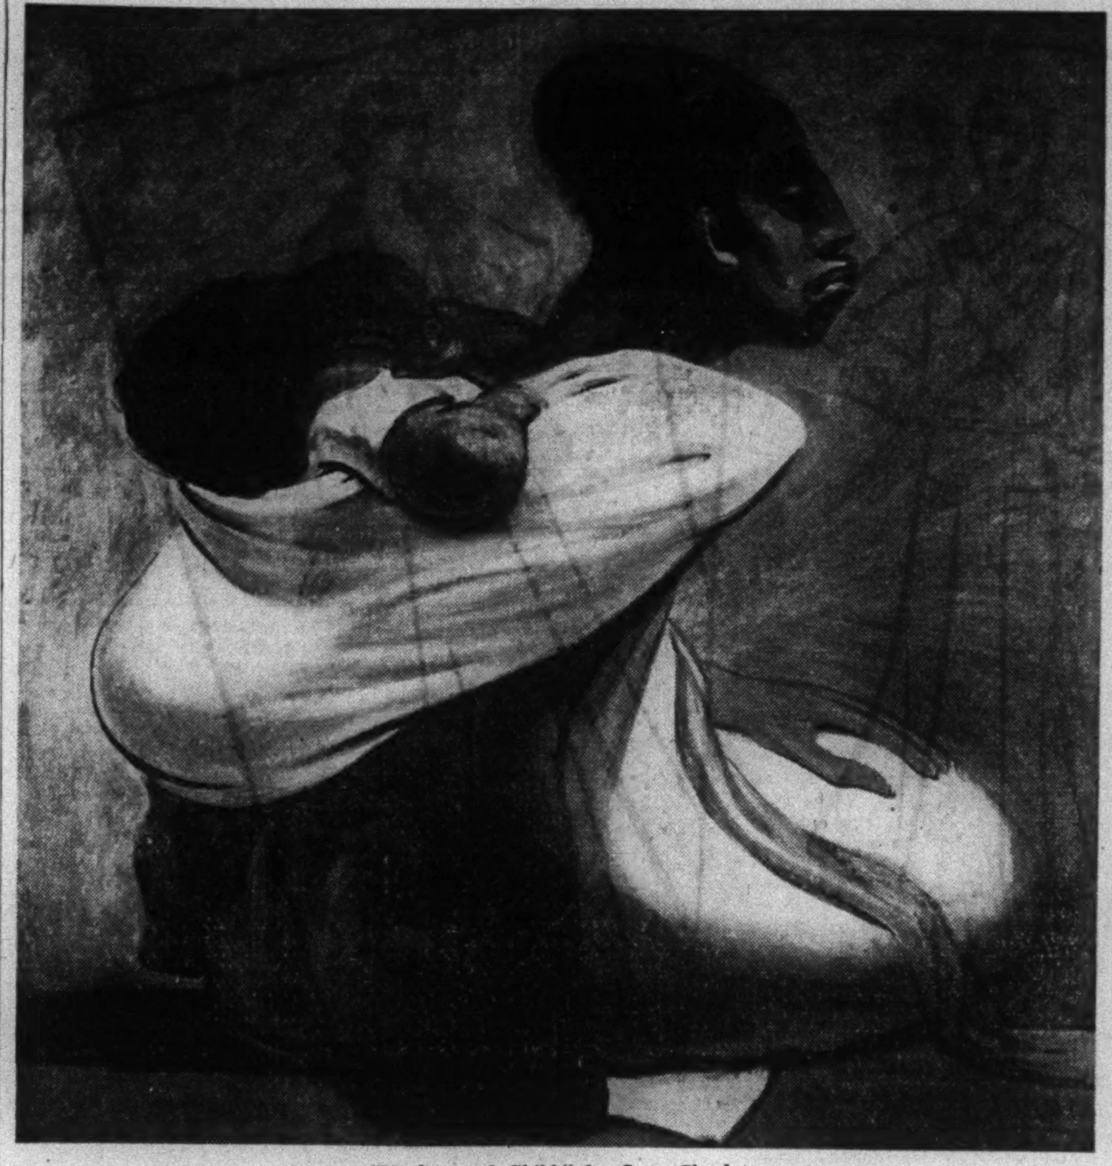
The appointment of William M. Milliken as director of the Cleveland Museum of Art is announced by the president, John L. Severance. This action fills the vacancy caused by the resignation last May of Frederic Allen Whiting, now president of the American Federation of Arts.

GERMAN ARCHITECTURE.

Walter Gropius, director of the so-called "Bauhaus" circle in Dessau, is recognized as one of Germany's leaders. What interests him is the construction of buildings out of iron and glass, a movement which came from France almost a hundred years ago. In this Gropius makes common cause with his colleague, Bruno Taut, who, while the world still allowed itself wild fantasies, intended building out of chiseled glass prisms whole hill cities, flying buttresses and colonnades. But it is to the credit of both Gropius and Taut that they fitted themselves to the given requirements and, as the first in this realistic age, turned their ability to creating an ideal type of factory and block building as well as suburban settlement communities, according to the principle of symmetry.



"Mother and Child," by Jean Charlot.

VENICE.

LAST Sunday we reviewed the current Venice International, but delayed comment on the art displayed in the American pavilion. One reason for putting it off was a state of perplexity in the writer's mind. What was to be said of the American group? And now that the occasion has at length arrived, what is to be said of it?

Disappointment, acute enough upon one's first visit to these rooms, became subsequently a little softened. A second survey tended to permit individual excellencies to assert themselves with accent less blurred by the ambient confusion. Still, it cannot but be felt that, especially as compared with some of the really resounding affirmations elsewhere, our ensemble is tepid, to say the least.

The main trouble appears to be that the Grand Central School of Thought doesn't harmoniously blend with—well, with certain other schools of thought. It might really have been better had only Grand Central artists been included this year. As it is, Edward Hopper looks so queerly forlorn in his niche encompassed by Leo Katz, Robert Henry and Emil J. Bistran. No more comfortably stands Eugene Speicher (his splendid portrait of Katherine Cornell!) between the "Margherita" by Ellen Emmet Rand and the "Colonel Driscol" by Max Bohm.

Marguerite Zorach's 'cello boy makes the best of a rather precarious perch over a door. There is a fairly good John Sloan, a curious early Leon Kroll. Karfiol's portrait of a boy (his classic-romantic period) from the Phillips Memorial Gallery adds appreciably to the credit total. Also of prime importance are portraits like that of Stewart Reinhart by Anne Goldthwaite and that of Reginald Marsh by Alexander Brook. A grand Bellows does what it can to combat the rather excessive sweetness that drifts from canvases by Ettore Caser, Marie Danforth Page and . . . and others.

No, the ingredients somehow will not mix. You may rejoice in your Coleman, your Sidney Dickinson, your Higgins (not at his best, though); your Joseph Pollet and Abram Poole and Hovsep Pushman. You may duly note (or rather you cannot escape) the thousandth reappearance of Lillian Westcott Hale's "Portrait of T. S. Hardin," which scored first honors once at the Academy and has since been on the road. With all said and done, the act gathers in only a faltering ripple of applause.

It is almost as if two acts were simultaneously in progress on the stage, with results that can be imagined. Even circuses keep their rings separate. Is this a kind of futurism? If so, it creates no vehement appetite for more. Let us bravely face the issue. The United States is feebly represented upon its first appearance in a house of its own—and this despite the fact that much of the material is of unquestioned merit.

Treasures in Lichtenstein and Moderne Galerie—The Spirited Secession—A Workshop That Keeps Vigorously Abreast

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

VIENNA.

THERE is something so indefeasibly civilized about Vienna, which one appreciates long before beginning any systematic round of galleries. The various shades of difference between being civilized and being sophisticated need not engage attention at this point (and is it Clive Bell who has written so interestingly about a nation's ascent from civilization to culture, or vice versa?) Vienna, being civilized, is also cultured, and, being cultured, is sophisticated. But, possessed of these several concomitants of greatness, it exposes besides a a charm of simplicity—pretty generally acknowledged to be a divining rod by means of which we may locate all such desirable qualities.

"I am sure," one visitor hazarded the other day, "that at the next corner there will be a drug store with a soda fountain"—so curiously does the Ringstrasse conjure a big, substantial, seasoned and unhurried country town. Is it those double rows of fine trees, with the lights of shop and hotel gleaming softly through their shade, and tram cars—the quietest and best behaved in Europe—running along so bonnily? Is it the dignified spaciousness, the cool inviting leisure of the cafés, in one of which the vivacious playing of a Bohemian band (imported and politely advertised) seems just a little at odds with the leafy stillness outside? Is it a sum of causes, each happy factor helping to brew an "atmosphere" more palpable than that investing any of the once so celebrated Viennese operettas?

Long Summer evenings set a crown of gentleness and rest upon the day's exploits, or coax from hither and yon care-free adventure, still responsive to call despite the decline of pre-war gayety. Whether you heed it or not, there waits at your elbow a sort of bucolic friendliness that yet confesses its unimpeachable urbanity, its chic, even its dash of piquant wickedness. Was it perhaps in the Vienna of this contemporary vintage that Angna Enters caught the spirit of her festival in the Wienerwald?

WELL, in this delightful town it is always puzzling to decide what to do first. One bent on covering the field thoroughly could devote weeks to Vienna's collections of painting and sculpture; nor need the reminder be stressed that a visitor with schedule howsoever condensed should not miss the Lichtenstein Gallery, above all memorable for its magnificent canvases by Rubens and van Dyke. The Italian Renaissance, early and late, primitives to Tiépolo, is also well, though not copiously, represented. The Lichtenstein isn't, of course, to be classed with great national museums like the Kaiser Friedrich in Berlin, where everything is staged on a heroic scale, but it contains much that is of the very first importance. Unfortunately, the palace, in itself not unimpressive and possessed of several fine ceilings, is unsuited to its present use; the lighting is often quite hopeless—a defect made doubly deplorable by the quality of the art there housed.

In search of art more modern, one may explore the resources of the Oesterreichische Galerie, whose collections are scattered but easily accessible. For instance, nineteenth century artists are found in Prinz Eugenstrasse; baroque and contemporary or recent, in two adjoining palaces in Rennweg, with delightful gardens for sculpture, native and foreign. An illuminating panorama of Austrian work done mostly in this century invites study in the Moderne Galerie. Excellent "old-school" artists like Rudolf Bacher get on quite amicably with excellent newer men like Herbert Böckl, Klimt, Gerhart Frankl, Max Oppenheimer (now settled in Berlin) and many others. The collection here, which includes some beautiful things by artists of other countries, is fairly small and amazingly good.

ONE of the writer's most stimulating experiences in Vienna proved to be a call (duration: only, alas, about fifteen minutes) at the Frühjahrs show of the Wiener Secession. There was just time one day after a trip to the Schönbrunn palace to run in, dash through the rooms of the Secession and regret the closing of doors at 6 o'clock. Too often, sated and weary, you rejoice at the command to leave an exhibition so that the attendants, no doubt still more sated and weary, may go home to their dinners. Such was not the case, however, in this instance, for the Secession is by far the best affair of its kind the reviewer has ever inspected. A large percentage of the pictures could safely be moved right over to the Moderne Galerie, and that is saying much for a supposedly "radical" demonstration. Perhaps the secession idea in Vienna has by now become so mellowed that it no longer necessitates flinging discretion to the winds or tearing a passion to tatters.

The art of the decorative portrait, indeed of decorative work in general, and with the poster technique, here reaches a very high level of attainment. Economy, too, achieves frequent and striking expression, as in one of Sergius Pauser's still-lifes, which disposes a few simple objects in an amplitude of space.

Ancient motifs are caught up and given thoroughly modern treatment, as in a quite wonderful "Fest auf dem Lande" by Ernst Huber, or in Julius Hüther's religious painting, "Der Abend." And what atmosphere is contrived by Richard Harlfinger in his several canvases; what strange fine rhythms there are in Oskar Laske's "Ikarus," his "Paradies der Tiere" and "Christi Einzug in Jerusalem"!

Sensitiveness to color and form and to a picture's architecture is encountered again and again. Likewise one feels repeatedly a sensitiveness to the quality of paint itself, which in competent hands can be winning and delightful without undue stress.

These pictures are simply good pictures, original, full of personality, often splendidly executed. Any country with a Secession like this need not tremble for the future. It would be a grand thing if the show—trimmed a bit here and there, but substantially intact—could be sent on the road, could cross the Atlantic. The reviewer left with an ardent desire to share his pleasure with the world at large.

WE have mentioned chic, and certainly the shops of Vienna today are the smartest shops on the Continent. They sparkle with new ideas. They fascinate with the freshness of investiture that has been given alike to things frivolous and to things indispensable. Not all of these articles, of course, were produced by the Wiener Werkstätte, which a couple of years ago celebrated the jubilee of its first quarter-century milestone, but the quickening impulse of this group of workers is everywhere evident. Not even the most superficial survey could fail to detect an influence thus powerful, while hours may profitably be spent visiting the Werkstätte shops themselves and the studios where such a surprising variety of material for modern use is turned out.

The vigor, the undiminished enthusiasm, the fertility of imagination with which an idea once revolutionary enough is carried on through all the phases of modern production make the Wiener Werkstätte perennially an item of news. There appears here to be nothing static. What was sensational in the past cannot, it is recognized, remain a pillar of fire by night and a cloud by day for the future. Only by constant rejuvenation, tireless creation of forms suitable to an as tireless process of social change, can the Wiener Werkstätte remain an artistic mentor. It is symptomatic, therefore, of the healthy state of this organization that the output of its shops is as vital today to the maintenance of Austria's position in the artistic world as ever.

THE most dazzling source of information about the Wiener Werkstätte is still a volume issued in connection with the jubilee. Whether this sumptuous object ought to be called a book has always been a subject of controversy. Removing it from its red and black box, you seem to hold in your hands a sort of archaic square title. The "plastic" covers, about a quarter of an inch thick, also in black and red, appear to have been stamped when in a pulpy state, and the finished result is a bas-relief pattern, not less attractive, not even less original, because to some it seems Etruscan, while to others its seems Assyrian. As a matter of fact, one would probably be nearer right in calling it simply Mathilde Flögl, for the ingenious covers, the delightful end papers, and in fact the entire architecture of the book belong to her.

In this book, with its curious marginless typography, its striking use of black and gold and red, you find illustrated examples of all the principal wares for which the Wiener Werkstätte is now famous. Ceramic figures by that delicious artist, Vally Wieselthier (there was a large assortment of her work last year at the Art Centre in New York), and also by C. O. Czeschka, Dagobert Peche, E. Kopriva and Susi Singer, pursuing a similar vein; bags in bead and leather; lace, fabrics of every description; wall papers, tea and coffee services, vases; designs by the late and very much lamented Gustav Klimt, who, while he seems not actually to have been a member of the Werkstätte group, was its good friend from the precarious days of infancy. Also you find between Mathilde Flögl's plastic covers specimens of Josef Hoffmann's architecture—notably the house (or palace) built in Brussels some years ago for Baron Stocklet.

Frau Mäda Primavesi, long a zealous supporter of the Werkstätte movement, showed the writer a portfolio of new wallpaper designs by Mathilde Flögl, which stir an italicized sense of satisfaction. Of course, between samples and their large-scale application in a room lies a gulf not always dependably traversed by the imagination. However, one would gamble on many of these gay, spirited designs, reasonably confident that with intelligent selection of the room's further equipment the result would not disappoint.

The current Werkbund exhibition, which Walter Rendell Storey has recently discussed in detail, spreads out on to a terrace where refreshment and dancing lure many who are not confirmed exhibition followers. It is a device that might well be adopted by all enterprises of this nature, at once drumming up attendance and emphasizing—as it were, dramatizing—the intimate relationship between the decorative arts and simple daily living.

A FINAL vignette—just that—and we shall call it a day. Strolling once more at night under the trees of the Ringstrasse, meditating upon one thing and another, saddened by the thought of tomorrow's departure, one recalled with special gratitude a glimpse of Professor Cizek's little school.

What a small room in which to apply a principle so vast in its implications! The walls were covered with pupils' work—if "pupils," in the strict sense, these fortunate children may be called. And at a desk hedged round-about with books sat Professor Cizek, a man now well along in life but young-looking for his years. There was a twilight of patient disillusion in his eyes. It must be remembered that Socratic theories have ever to ply the uphill path, besides which Vienna is not more apt than other towns at honoring her own prophets.

There is nothing new to report—only that all is well. And this prophet's last words go on saying themselves over and over in the mind's retentive ear, resubmitting their distillation of experience and their essence of high wisdom:

"What a pupil learns from the teacher, that is nothing; what a teacher learns from his pupil, that is everything."

Local Mention

PROFESSOR ROWLEY of Columbia University will conduct two courses in Chinese art this year. His series of lectures on the "History of Chinese Art" emphasizes the growth of style in its reflection of the thought and feelings of the different periods and also particularly stresses the "philosophic" landscape, which he considers "China's unique contribution to the history of painting." A "Seminar in Chinese Art," the second course, calls for presentation by students of papers on special problems in the history of Chinese painting, beginning with the Sung Dynasty. General discussion will follow.

PAINTINGS by Nathalie Newking and Lorser Feitelson are on exhibition at the Brooklyn Museum, remaining there until October. These painters, both native Americans, held their first joint exhibition in New York at the Daniel Gallery in 1925. In Paris they exhibited some of their neo-classic paintings at the Salon d'Automne in 1923 and at the Visconte Gallery in 1922.

During the last two years they have held large joint exhibitions at the Palace of the Legion of Honour in San Francisco, at the Los Angeles Museum, Los Angeles, and at the Pasadena Art Museum in Pasadena, Cal.

THE FIRST SKETCHES FROM IMPORTANT PARIS OPENINGS

FORMAL TRENDS

Afternoon, Evening Modes More Closely Related

PARIS.

PARIS afternoon and evening modes are getting together again after their distinct separation of the last two seasons. The women themselves are responsible for this; they simply could not take time to be always rushing home to change, and the result is that all the courturiers are featuring in their Winter collections formal afternoon frocks, dressy enough to be worn on to dinner and the theatre, and sleeved evening frocks equally suitable for the evening party or the afternoon reception.

Jean Patou's "restaurant gowns" are a good example of such costumes. He makes simple, almost tailored short-sleeved afternoon gowns of lamé, moire or satin and covers them with broadcloth or velvet fur-trimmed coats, in black or in his new rich dark yellow-green. These frocks have slender skirts falling to the ankle, and one black velvet afternoon dress trimmed with Venetian lace actually touches the floor.

Fur Sets Presented

PATOU also features fur sets, consisting of a square asymmetrically draped shawl or pelerine and muff which also does duty as a bag, in sable, ermine, mink or marten, that replace fur trimming and may be worn interchangeably with the dress or coat, and these accessories add or subtract formality, at will.

The Patou short-peplum evening frocks of brocade or faille with high boat-shaped décolletés, cut out below in front and attached at the neckline with jeweled brooches, that have the shoulder line extended a little over the upper arms in sleeve effects, are also significant of the informal evening trend, as is his use of thin felt to make an evening coat, richly trimmed with silver fox, to accompany a draped black and white satin frock.

Lelong gives many of his evening frocks sleeved effects by dropped-shoulder décolletés often surrounded by a little Victorian flounce suspended from the shoulder straps, sometimes by little caps or drapery over the upper arm. His dark green, wine or negre evening ensembles of faille and velvet with the simple frock decorated by appliqué or embroidery trimming would not be out of place at restaurant dinner or cocktail party.

Sleeves for Evening

THE only evening frocks shown by Suzanne Talbot are sleeved ones. Medieval robes of black velvet have long trailing velvet sleeves or old lace, ruffled, elbow sleeves to match the ruffles round a square décolleté. The hems touch the floor when they do not trail, which makes them more suitable to the afternoon hostess, but she could go on to an evening party elsewhere without dressing.

Long-sleeved evening frocks are the sensation of Jeanne Lanvin's collection. They are floor length, of velvet or satin, with chiffon sleeves shaped like an hour-glass, decorated by horrizontal stripes of paillettes with a plain space at the elbow. The upper half of the hour-glass forms the wide armhole the lower half trails. Lanvin makes fewer evening ensembles, too. Her three-quarter evening coats, flaring loose from the shoulder line, are often of red trimmed with black fox. The long-sleeved black frock that they accompany may well be worn for afternoon with a less conspicuous wrap.

Drop Shoulder Decolletes

MOLYNEUX'S evening mode is delightful in its simplicity. He is featuring the styles of the French Revolution with empire waist-lines and drop shoulder décolletés or little puff sleeves, but with much more comfortable skirt fullness than the empire dresses, which he achieves by shirring at the natural waist-line and then, by three shirred flounces attached one to the edge of the other, giving the skirt a gentle progressive flare. These frocks are above-ankle length. Even in Wiener's gorgeous flowered chiffon lamés which Molyneux features they are not too pretentious for late afternoon and in a darker, less rich material and with a long coat they would not be conspicuous earlier in the day. The fur-trimmed fabric scarfs and muffs that accompany many of these costumes also take away from any effect of stiff formality.

Chantal gives some of her evening frocks little dyed ermine jackets to reduce their formality. Champcommunal launches elbow-length leg-o'-mutton sleeves whose sun-ray pleated tops form a narrow yoke at the back to hold them on. They may be removed; disclosing a formal décolleté frock.

Lucile Paray's short-sleeved afternoon frocks of lace or eyelet embroidered chiffon are dressy enough for the informal evening, and their straight lines with fullness added by shirred panels make them easy to wear. Strasse or cut steel embroidery lends fire to some of her dark velvet and satin ensembles for the latter part of the fashionable day.

Maggy Rouff shows a whole group of black lace or mousseline dinner gowns with short or long sleeves.

NEW FASHIONS RECALL OLD

MANIKINS at the Paris openings were not accompanied by chaperons, but that seems to be about the only symbol of bygone days the couturiers neglected to revive. Muffs, pelerines, poke bonnets, Kate Greenaway frocks, off-the-shoulder décolletés, leg-o'-mutton sleeves—the list is endless—are with us again, but in modified forms suitable to the swift pace of 1930 days.

Just arrived from Paris, the sketches on this page today present a number of the high-lights of the new mode as revealed at significant openings. True, there are not the startling changes there were a year ago. Rather, we note further development of the trend to romantic formal clothes that began then while daytime costumes continue to have the crisp, wearable, reasonably short-skirted freedom American women insist upon. The emphasis is on diversity and details, which are sufficient in number and newness to make the strongest minded women ignore a wobbly bank account and leap into unintended purchasing.

The short fur jacket worn over a woolen dress is a fashion much talked of by observers just back from Paris. The one illustrated here poses a jaunty brief coat of beige and black Persian lamb over a black wool frock. Many houses showed this type of costume, including Vionnet and Patou, whose pointed fur capelets are reported an instant success. Also in the daytime picture are suits and coats on the order of the Bruyère models shown here, both of which have been ordered by a Fifth Avenue shop.

Varying degrees of formality come under the head of afternoon clothes, some being so formal as to verge on the evening mode. There is considerable discussion on this side of the ocean as to whether the extremely formal type of afternoon dress described in the Paris letter on this page has a real place in the American wardrobe. One of the most astute stylists in New York, just back from viewing the openings, believes that American women prefer "a good silk dress, not too long," for all afternoon occasions, and a real evening dress for anything later.

Designers contributed several new quirks to the evening mode. Chanel, whose creations are always eagerly snatched up by smart, youthful American women, continued her earlier successful silhouette with the skirt widened and stiffened at the hem. Her new trick you will be hearing about this season consists of several rows of heavy silver stitching on the edges of the black tulle frocks she does so perfectly. Another innovation was her use of tricolor lace combinations for evening. One, in pink, blue and black, is illustrated here. There was a lot of pink, a clear baby pink, in her evening collection.

A brand new back appeared on a number of evening dresses that are certain to be seen in New York before long. It is a strapped effect, very much like the most backless bathing suits you've ever seen.

Off-the-shoulder décolletés were favored by many houses, including Molyneux, who had a most interesting collection. Sketched here are two of his new evening creations, one a directoire dress in lace, the other crêpe romain pleated from top to bottom. Stiff velvet is another fabric that has a place in the formal mode. The Patou ruby red velvet illustrated is trimmed with brown fur.

PARIS SHOWS TUNICS FOR FALL

Couturiers Give Them Prominent Place in All Phases Of the Mode—Long and Short Types

WHEREAS no very radical changes were advanced at the August Paris openings to disturb the established silhouette, new details and treatments were plentiful. Among the most prominent of these was the tunic, presented in one form or another by practically every couturier, leaving no doubt as to its importance in Fall fashions. It is a natural sequence to the peplum that enlivened last season's creations and a more versatile and adaptable detail than its predecessor.

In view of the brevity of some of the new tunics, one might be moved to ask just when a peplum stops being a peplum and becomes a tunic. The chief difference seems to lie in the fact that a peplum may be merely a detail of a skirt, whereas a tunic is really a development of an overblouse.

The Different Types

PATOU, who presented one or two long tunics in formal afternoon creations in his May collection, continued this Fall presenting an impressive array of tunics on daytime and evening clothes. Nor was he alone in this, for a résumé of the August openings discloses the fact that the tunic is progressing nicely in all modes—sports, street, daytime and evening apparel.

The tunic line is well suited to the coat-dress type of frock that is due for widespread popularity this Fall. It has been successfully adapted in the deluge of smart new sheer and lightweight woolens that are flooding the daytime fashion horizon. Patou showed one very good-looking tunic coat-dress made of black wool with collar and cuffs of white piqué. The tunic in this instance was uneven, starting with a group of fan pleats from hip to knees at one side, swinging down in a flat line across the front, curving up with a slight ripple at the hem across the back.

After a long Summer of tuck-in blouses we find the overblouse competing for favor in the more formal creations of Autumn. And in this field the tunic treatment achieves great success. It is especially well suited to dressy fabrics such as satin, lamé and other metal brocades. A lovely one from Lanvin's collection was made of silver lamé. It had a high cowl neckline, long tight sleeves that ended in a deep ruffle of fine pleating. A stitched belt was posed at the waist-line and the hem of the tunic that curved up slightly in front was likewise edged with a ruffle of pleating.

Chanel is to be numbered among the exponents of the tunic and showed them in sports and in daytime creations. One of wool lace, over a velvet skirt, was sufficiently formal for afternoon wear.

MOSLEM WOMEN ARE ADVANCING AT DIFFERENT PACES

Revolutionary Changes by Legislation in Turkey Followed More Cautiously in the Other Countries of the Near East

By AMEEN RIHANI.

FROM the seclusion of the harem women of the Near East are going out to the public school, to the open forum, to the dance hall, and even to the business world. The change, social and intellectual, is evident everywhere, from Turkey to Arabia and from Egypt to Afghanistan. There is also a European or Western significance; Eastern women attend women congresses in Europe, Western women travel in the East. Women of East and West meet on common ground and exchange views and confidences. Thus the old status of woman in the Near East is changing.

How fast is it changing? There is Occidental speed in Turkey; there is a steady advance in Egypt; there is determination flavored with controversy in Syria, and in Arabia, Persia and Afghanistan there is traditional caution highly spiced with modern ambition. Everywhere there is a common urge, however, and a tendency to get together.

At the women's congress held in Damascus last June were delegates from all the countries mentioned. Speeches were made in languages that were not all Asiatic. The representative of an international organization of women in Europe spoke in French; the delegate from Persia delivered an address in English, and the head of the Turkish delegation spoke in fluent Arabic. Arabic, of course, was the common medium, and through Arabic, with English and French as auxiliaries, the cardinal objectives of the women's movement will eventually be achieved everywhere in the Near East.

Eastern Women's Rights.

These objectives, as expressed by the president of the congress, are three: monogamy, the right of a girl to choose her own husband and abolition of seclusion.

Polygamy, the veil and the harem have already passed away in Turkey. The movement, in the most successful of Oriental republics, has in fact passed beyond the first stage of enfranchisement. It began under Sultan Abd'ul-Hamid and progressed slowly down to the time of Mustapha Kemal. Since then the tempo, and not the spirit, has changed. In 1912 I heard a woman haranguing a crowd in one of the streets of Constantinople. She was the first woman to unveil in public, and after she had finished her speech she waved her veil as a banner of freedom. Many women followed her example and soon the eloquent gesture became superfluous.

It cannot be said, therefore, that Mustapha Kemal is the author of the Turkish woman's freedom. He is its official protagonist and its guide. The American School for Girls in Constantinople—now Istanbul—is still the principal factor in modern education.

Women Find New Problems.

The path of Turkish women is checkered with the lights and shades of European experiment. The daughters of the indolent women of the harem must not only go to school, they must also work. They must earn their own livings, find their own husbands, solve their own domestic problems. Freedom's compensations are seldom free from freedom's heartaches.

How much the modern Turkish girl is beginning to feel this cannot be ascertained at this early stage of her enfranchisement. Encouraged by the dictator, stimulated by his edicts, she is bravely going ahead. There are for her diversion playgrounds on the way. And there are dance halls and beauty contests to keep up her spirit. There are also cafés where she may tarry to survey the masculine world or to be surveyed by it while she sips her drink and smokes her cigarette. The girl who once read Pierre Loti in the secrecy of the harem now reads Bernard Shaw and Bertrand Russell on a park bench in Taksim. She is willing to stand dressed in European fashions before the judges of a beauty contest while the editor of a Turkish review publishes her photograph with the nonchalance of a theatrical manager. But other contests of a more serious nature are taking place today in Turkey, and the Turkish girl, even as a typist, is catching up with her American sisters.

The More Conservative East.

On the other hand, her Moslem sisters in other parts of the Near East do not altogether approve of her speed. She is too fast for them, even as Mustapha Kemal is too fast for the mullahs of Afghanistan. The fact is that the woman movement in Turkey, because of its ultra-revolutionary spirit, is exerting little or no influence beyond the Turkish frontiers. This revolutionary spirit may be suited to the Turk in whom the Islamic religion is not, after all, deeply rooted; but it cannot find free access into such strongholds of Islam as Persia and Arabia or be received enthusiastically in such centres of Islamic learning as Cairo and Damascus.

Thus, by its own force and scope, the movement is isolated. But there are before it the possibilities of either increasing in power and overcoming the barriers of tradition or of experiencing a reaction which will force the Turkish woman to take a few steps backward to meet her slowly advancing Eastern sisters. The latter, in my opinion, is more probable.

In Egypt the Moslem girl has a thorny path, and the thorns are not from Europe. Azhar University of Cairo furnishes the nation with hedges of every kind. The Azhar dons, who are more intransigeant and strait-laced than any of their colleagues elsewhere, oppose with the Koran every innovation imported from Europe. Not long ago there was a flaming controversy between them and the young reformers about the hat; and one of the dons wrote a book to prove that the hat is not the proper thing for an orthodox Moslem, that it is not sanctioned by the Koran. Incidentally, in a part of Southern Arabia the sun, and not the Koran, is the recognized authority. The Arabs there, men and women, who are not less religious than the learned shaikhs of Al-Azhar, find it necessary, when they are working in the fields, to wear hats—large straw hats of their own making.

When it comes to argument it does not require much effort to drive the heavy-turbaned Moslem dons to the wall. Qasim Amin, one of the greatest of modern Egyptians, drove them all to the wall, but, apparently, as it was then observed, to no purpose. More than a dozen books were written against this one book, "The Emancipation of Woman." On both sides the Koran was invoked. "Woman's place," said the dons, "is where the Prophet placed her." "The Prophet," said Qasim Amin, "found woman in bonds, a miserable chattel, and after lifting her to a position that was compatible with the spirit of the times, he opened to her, through the very Koran, the way of gradual development and freedom. We are continuing the work of the Prophet." And the reformer, who was an eminent jurist, could not be accused of misunderstanding or misinterpreting the Koran.

This was forty years ago, when in Turkey rarely a voice was heard for the emancipation of woman. Qasim Amin was then alone, not only in Egypt, but in the whole Islamic world; and now, fifteen years after his death, he is the guiding light of a nation-wide movement and he has many disciples even among the students of the Azhar University.

But the foremost exponent of his principles today is a woman of rank and power, the widow of the nationalist leader, the late Said Zaghlul. When her husband was exiled by the British Government in 1922, she was asked if she would like to accompany him. "No," she replied, "I will remain here to continue his work." Another influential disciple of Qasim Amin who, like the widow of Zaghlul, has discarded the veil and who takes an active interest also in politics, is Huda Shi-rawi, a society leader and organizer of exceptional ability. Lady Huda is also one of the best known Oriental women in Europe, where she frequently sojourns, moving from one women's congress to another in the interest of her country and her sex.

Qasim Amin has also received, directly and indirectly, official recognition. At the Egyptian University, not long ago, tribute was paid to a young authoress whose work was inspired by the reformer, and when the Egyptian sculptor, Mukhtar, was commissioned by the government to make a monument to Egypt, he conceived it in the terms of the woman movement. His work is in reality a tribute to Qasim Amin, for the Mother of the Nation in marble stands erect and unveiled.

But the veil in itself is no longer a vital issue. The change from a heavy material to a light chiffon, white or black, is a significant comment upon its evolution. From an esthetic point of view, however, there is a hope, even among the moderns, that it does not thin down to nothing. The Egyptian flapper in high heels, short skirt and filmy veil is a picturesque contribution to that kaleidoscope of color and fashion. She exemplifies the potency, even the gayety, of silken defiance. And as a recruit she is also often seen among the more conventional of her sex in the political demonstrations of the day. Thus, through the various channels of politics and education, of culture and fashion, the mission of Qasim Amin is being accomplished.

It is also radiating its influences to other Arab-speaking countries through the written word. There are today several magazines in Cairo devoted to the movement and edited by Christian and Moslem women. But the most distinguished among the writers is Mary Ziadi, a Christian from Mount Lebanon, whose home in Cairo is the magnet of the intellectuals of both sexes and of all religions. It is the only salon that I know of in the Near East. Miss Ziadi writes under the pen name of Maly, and she is fast becoming a power in the woman's movement, not only in Egypt but wherever Arabic is read.

In Syria many other forces and influences are at work. But the Moslem woman there, although opposed to the old traditions, is not ready, it seems, for any radical action. She has not the heroic quality of the Turkish woman, who tore off her veil and waved it as a banner of freedom; nor is she favored with the economic conditions that enabled many families in Egypt during the past forty years to employ foreign governesses and teachers for the education of their girls at home.

Moreover, the spread of French fashions in Syria—the fashions, rather, of the Paris Boulevard, with a powder puff and a lipstick to complete the public defiance—aroused even the Moslem youth to indignation and rage. The Moslem women, dressed in the Paris fashion, were attacked on the streets with nitric acid, which penetrated through silk and satin. Some of them were burned in the face. Later, in Damascus, which is more conservative than Beirut, a daughter of one of the best families, dressed modestly, walked through the bazaar unveiled and was slapped in the face by a fanatical shaikh. These instances of the assertion of a primitive masculine prerogative had, on the surface, the desired effect. They checked the extravagance in style. But beyond the surface, deep in the soul of woman, they awakened a dormant power. Indeed, Syrian women, it was soon realized, were capable of more resistance than they had shown. Instead of publicly protesting, however, they are organizing. And as a reply, perhaps, to the fanatical shaikhs of Damascus, a women's congress was held in that most ancient of cities for the first time in its history.

An Educational Movement.

An essential feature of the movement in Syria and Palestine and Iraq, is that women of all creeds, Moslems, Christians and Druses, are working together; and they are all agreed that agitation is not the wisest policy and that organization is not sufficient. They are all agreed that education is the best and safest road to success. And today in the four capitals, in Jersualem, Beirut, Damascus and Bagdad, the movement for education is even more popular than the Paris fashions. Twenty years ago there were not more than thirty or forty Moslem girls in the various schools of these four cities; today, in Beirut alone, I was told by the Minister of Education, the attendance is more than 1,000.

Beirut, the leading centre of education in the Near East, has more schools and colleges, native and foreign, than any city of its size in the world. But its girls' schools, before the World War, were all foreign and more or less of a missionary character. That is why Moslem parents refused to send their daughters to them.

But during the war, when all the foreign schools were closed, a Syrian woman, Mary Kassab, opened a native school in the building of the English mission. The success of this school was such that the attendance in a few years rose from twenty to 300, and an enthusiasm for education was kindled in all the neighboring countries. From Iraq, from Palestine, from all parts of the Arabic-speaking world, girls of all creeds—Moslems and Christians and Druses—come today to the Ahliyah School of Mary Kassab. The secret of its popularity lies principally in the fact that, besides being native, it is nonsectarian. Technically and executively also it enjoys an uncommon reputation.

The emancipation of woman in Turkey has been achieved principally through legislation, but in Egypt and Syria, in all the Arabic-speaking countries, as well as in Persia, it is being achieved through education. While emphasizing the power of the school, however, the leaders of the movement do not deny the power of the government. The two together are certainly more effective and more permanent in their good than the edicts of a dictator.

VIRGINIA DARE'S BIRTH MARKED IN PAGEANT

By RALPH TOWNSEND.

TOMORROW the few hundred inhabitants of Roanoke Island, sixty miles north of Cape Hatteras, will present the annual pageant that has long been a tradition there, recalling Sir Walter Raleigh's tragic attempt to found a colony on this spot. Here, more than twenty years before the founding of Jamestown and thirty-three years before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, the first band of pioneer English emigrants settled and the first English child in the New World, Virginia Dare, was born on Aug. 18, 1587.

The program of the assembly will begin with prayers, then there will be a history reading, and finally a procession of men and women in Elizabethan dress over the hillside that serves as a stage.

Both the actors in the pageant and the reverent, quiet-mannered audience belong to the fisher-folk population. They are nearly all of straight English descent, dating the arrival of their forebears early in the country's history, and preserving in their speech words and phrases of seventeenth-century England.

Raleigh's Motives.

While the main historical events of the pageant deal with the happenings of the year 1587, the story of Raleigh's determination to plant a colony in America goes back three years earlier. Besides the appeal of such a scheme to his adventurous nature, Raleigh had two very practical motives in undertaking the project. The first was that his finances, always dependent upon the whims of Queen Elizabeth, needed stabilizing with a more reliable source of income. A second motive was the desire to improve his prestige at court. Essex and other rival courtiers were beginning to make Raleigh's position in the future doubtful.

So in the Summer of 1584 Raleigh invested a large part of his private fortune in equipping two vessels for a voyage of reconnoitering the Middle Atlantic Coast, the Spanish being already in possession of Florida. In September they returned, with glowing accounts of Roanoke Island, a conspicuous bit of vivid green that stood out against miles of bleak dunes and spits of sand. The party brought back specimens of plants and animals, two live savages and a folio of sketches made by the artist of the expedition. The sketches are still in existence in the British Museum.

The description of the island was a glowing document. The natives were declared to be a "very handsome and goodly people, and in their behavior as mannerly and civil as any of Europe * * * most gentle and loving and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age." The forecasts regarding agriculture were equally enthusiastic: "The soil is the most plentiful, sweet, fruitful, wholesome of all the worlde." Further in their report, as a hint of commercial prospects, the two captains wrote: "We exchanged our tinne dish for twentie skinnes, worth twentie Crownes, or twentie Nobles; and a copper kettle for fiftie skinnes worth fiftie Crownes." Such barter was no mean incentive.

Among other things they brought back a supply of smoking tobacco, which had not been seen before in England.

Raleign was jubilant. But his first attempt at settlement, made the next year when he dispatched 108 men to Roanoke Island, was a failure. The absence of women was an inauspicious circumstance and the party suffered from a shortage of food and from Indian attacks. When Sir Francis Drake touched at the island for a visit on his voyage of exploration, the discontented colonists deserted and accompanied him back to England.

Still determined, but now badly depleted in funds, Raleigh gambled everything in equipping a final party of 121 persons. These reached Roanoke early in the Summer of 1587. The most serious cause of previous discontent had been remedied. The new party contained a considerable number of women.

Before the party had been long established, the first child was born, described in records of the time as a blue-eyed, yellow-haired girl, the daughter of Ananias and Eleanor Dare. In honor of her birthplace, the parents christened her Virginia. Roanoke Island is now a part of North Carolina, but at that time it was a part of the vaguely defined Middle Atlantic region called Virginia.

Misfortune and tragedy still seemed to lurk over Raleigh's colonization ventures. In the Autumn following the birth of Virginia Dare, the leader of the colony, John White, was forced to return to England for supplies, and left behind him a few score anxious settlers, poorly equipped and ill-protected.

When White reached England he found the Spanish Armada threatening the country and was obliged to postpone his return to Roanoke Island for two years. When he finally anchored again opposite the fort he had built before his departure no sign of life greeted him upon the shore. Hurrying to the sandy beach in a small boat he found carved upon a tree the single word Croatoan. This was taken to mean that the colonists had fled to a neighboring tribe of Indians of that name. The fort had been plundered.

The Colony Disappears.

But search at the village of the Croatoans brought no trace of the hundred-odd colonists who were to be the beginnings of an empire. The savages encountered by the ship's men were either unwilling or unable to furnish a clue. The shots fired from the cannon at intervals brought only echoes. Raleigh's relief party had arrived too late. The condition of the demolished fort indicated that it had been abandoned not long before by the distracted and perhaps besieged colonists.

Even then Raleigh would have tried once more, but Elizabeth had deposed him in favor of Essex.

The spot where Virginia Dare was born is today marked by a slab of granite, surrounded, as the scene was three centuries ago, by tall trees and climbing grapevines. The fort is on a slight knoll about 100 yards from the shore. Dense trees, heavily entangled with grapevines, grow to the water's edge.

Within a few years, it is expected, the wood about the fort will be made into a national monument.

RESORT PROGRAMS GROW FULL WITH LATE SEASON EVENTS

GAY DANCES AT NEWPORT

Week Is to Bring Three Large Private Parties—Annual Tennis Tourney

NEWPORT, R. I.

BY next Saturday night the members of the Summer colony here should be well tired out, for they will have passed through a veritable dancing week. A trio of big balls on three succeeding nights, given in honor of a trio of prominent young women of the colony, are on the program. When the week finally comes to a close all hands no doubt will be seeking a rest. It looks, too, as though they would have a chance to rest, for there is not another dance in sight until the following Saturday night.

Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights are to be the dancing nights. Mr. and Mrs. Marion Eppley are to start the ball rolling on Thursday, when at their home, Beacon Rock, the former E. D. Morgan estate, which looks out over the southern end of the harbor and Fort Adams, they are to give a dance for Miss Leta Morris, the débutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis G. Morris of New York. It will be in the nature of an informal coming-out party for her, for Mr. and Mrs. Morris had planned that their daughter should make her début here this Summer. A death in the family, however, necessitated a change in this plan and the formal coming-out has been put off until late Fall or early Winter in New York. Miss Morris is one of the leading young women tennis players of the colony, following in the footsteps of her mother—and being followed very closely in this respect by her younger sister, Betty.

On Friday night the centre of interest will be at Miramar, the Summer home of Dr. and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton Rice on Bellevue Avenue. Dr. and Mrs. Rice two Summers ago gave a memorable débutante ball for Miss Diana Dodge, daughter of Mrs. George D. Widener, whose engagement to Frederick Martin Davies was recently announced. This time Miss Dodge is again to be the guest of honor, but sharing the honors with her will be her fiancé.

Saturday night the scene shifts to the end of Bellevue Avenue at Rough Point, the home of Mrs. James B. Duke, for the first big party that has been given there in a long while. Mrs. Duke is giving a ball at which her daughter, Miss Doris Duke, who was presented at the Court of St. James's last Spring, will make her official bow to the social world.

These will be three of the largest parties of the year. Elaborate plans are being made for each of them and electrical decorations, in true Newport fashion, will be a brilliant feature.

Each of the dances is to be preceded by numerous dinner parties, the guests going to the balls later. On Thursday night Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Duncan are giving a dinner with music at Bonnie Crest. On Friday night one of the largest, prior to the Rice party, will be that given by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James at Beacon Hill House, and Saturday night Mr. and Mrs. Henry Walters, whose dance last Friday in honor of Miss Leila Delano of New York was one of the feature entertainments of the week, will give a large dinner at Sherwood.

ONE season sporting fixture after another rolls around. Last week it was the horse show. This week is tennis week and will be marked by the holding of the fourteenth annual invitation tennis tournament on the famous turf courts of the Newport Casino.

As usual, the tennis tournament is to be the signal for much extra entertaining in honor of the visiting players. While this program has not been fully made up as yet the tennis committee of the casino, headed by James Stewart Cushman of New York, will entertain the players one noon with a luncheon or beach party, and the woman's committee, headed by Mrs. Barger Wallach, a former national woman's tennis champion, and Mrs. William Goadby Loew, have the remainder of the program in hand.

Golf will claim its share of attention during the week and for the week-end Harry Payne Bingham of New York has offered prizes for a match-play tournament against par at the Newport Country Club. With all of the other things polo is not to be forgotten, for the Westchester Club will have its usual games at the Sandy Point Field in Portsmouth.

This afternoon, the week's entertaining is to start for the men of the colony, at least at the Clambake Club on Easton's Point, where there is to be held the second members' bake of the season.

Tuesday night will witness the opening of the second last week of the season at the Casino Theatre, when the Casino Players will give their first performance of Rachel Crothers's "Let Us Be Gay."

Tuesday is also to be the second last garden day of the Summer and for that afternoon Mrs. Hugh D. Auchincloss at Hammersmith Farm and Mrs. Nicholas Brown at Harbour Court are to open their gardens.

IN BERKSHIRES

Weddings on the Calendar At Great Barrington

PITTSFIELD, Mass.

GREAT BARRINGTON'S colony is looking forward to two weddings in September. The first will be that of Miss Lucy C. Downing, daughter of Mrs. Paul C. Downing, to Edward B. Nisbet, son of Mr. and Mrs. William B. Nisbet, on Sept. 10, and later in the month Miss Elizabeth Blodgett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett of New York and Great Pine Farm, is to be married to Livingston Hall.

Women members of the Wyantenuck Club are to hold next Tuesday the annual club bridge and tea. Golf and tennis tournaments as well as bridge parties and teas are making the season lively at the Wyantenuck Club.

Mrs. William F. Barrett of New York is to entertain the Lenox Garden Club council at Sky Farm, her estate in South Egremont, on Monday afternoon. The council of this club, of which Miss Georgianna W. Sargent is president, is limited to those who actually work in the dirt with spade and hoe. Among them are Mrs. Samuel Frothingham, Mrs. Banyer Clarkson and the Misses Mary Parsons, Georgianna Sargent, Heloise Meyer, Marion Davies, Emily Biddle and Adele Kneeland.

The twenty-second annual Stockbridge art exhibition is to be held at the Berkshire Playhouse, Stockbridge, from Sept. 12 to Oct. 5. Edward A. and Francis W. Crowninshield and their sister, Mrs. Carl A. de Gersdorff, are giving prizes of $300 for the best oil, piece of sculpture, water-color or pastel.

MANY WHITE MOUNTAIN BENEFITS

BRETTON WOODS, N. H.

COLONISTS in a number of the White Mountain resorts are busy raising funds for popular local charities. Intensive drives for the benefit of the North Conway, Littleton and Morrison hospitals are in progress and in these three sections of the White Mountains many benefit entertainments will be given this week. The Mountain View at Whitefield, which has just held a large benefit card party for the Morrison Hospital, will give another entertainment for this charity in September.

Members of the congregation of the Church of the Transfiguration at Bretton Woods have started a subscription fund for the benefit of the Bretton Woods choir boys, to be used for the maintenance of Camp Duncan on the Ammonoosuc, where the fifteen boys and their leader, Frank R. Hancock, make Summer headquarters. The choir boys make a Summer tour, with concerts nearly every night at some of the resort hotels or theatres in the White Mountain district.

Guests of the Bretton Woods hotels aid in supporting the popular local charity, the employes' emergency sick fund, and the recent annual "Bretton Woods Follies" at the Hall in the Pines and Mount Washington ballroom brought out distinguished audiences. The Mount Pleasant employes will stage their annual minstrel show on Aug. 22 and their annual bal-masque for the same charity on Aug. 25.

The White Mountains Golf League matches scheduled for this week are Maplewood Club vs. Crawford Notch, at Crawford, and Bethlehem Country Club vs. Waumbek Golf Club, at Jefferson. Gala events are made of these matches.

The annual tournament for the open amateur golf championship of the White Mountains will be played at the Maplewood Club later in the month, and during the coming two weeks several important golf tournaments are taking place for the benefit of the North Conway Memorial Hospital.

The annual women's golf tournament at Crawford Notch will be played on Monday and following days for the Jessie Ormiston Calhoun bowl.

THE WEEK AHEAD AT RESORTS

SOUTHAMPTON, L. I.

The Hampton Players will conclude their season at Southampton this week, with performances starting on Wednesday.

NEWPORT, R. I.

BIG WEEK FOR BAR HARBOR BOATS

Neighboring Yacht Clubs to Join in Cruise and Races—Garden Club to Meet at Rockefeller Home

BAR HARBOR, Me.

THEY go down to the sea in ships from Mount Desert Island. The racqueteers of the tennis court have their day, brief, bright and glorious; navies come, see, conquer and sail on, but from the beginning of the season until the last gun is fired there are very few days in the week when little M. D. I.'s, thirty square meters and their ilk, sloops, schooners and knockabouts, are not spreading white wings in competition for something—points, percentages, pennants—and, incidentally, adding interest and charm to the intense blue of these northern waters.

This week the Bar Harbor yachtsmen will join the Northwest Harbor fleet on the annual three-day cruise to Blue Hill, first racing each other—S Classes and M. D. I.'s—on an all-day race to Northeast Harbor on Wednesday. On Thursday the combined fleets race from Northeast Harbor to Sea Cove, on the western shore of Mount Desert. On the second day of the cruise the course will be to the Blue Hill Yacht Club in the morning and back to Seal Cove in the afternoon. On Saturday they race back to Northeast Harbor.

Another important race for the fleet is to be sailed tomorrow, the George Davenport Hayward Memorial Cup race. This cup was given by the friends of George Davenport Hayward in 1925 in memory of one who was a leading spirit in Northeast Harbor yachting.

Ashore next week there will be the meeting of the Garden Club on Thursday at the "Eyrie," Seal Harbor, the home of Mr. and Mrs. John D. Rockefeller Jr., where the president of the Garden Club of Mount Desert, Mrs. Gilbert Montague of New York and Seal Harbor, will talk on the meeting of the National Garden Clubs, which was held at Portland, Ore., in July. After Mrs. Montague's talk the usual tea and informal discussion of garden problems will follow.

The Kebo Valley Golf Club will play off two tournaments this week, the Waldron Bates Memorial Cup on Wednesday and the S. Megaree Wright tournament on Saturday, both for members only. On Monday there will be the usual putting contest and tea at the clubhouse. Mrs. George E. Dadmun and Miss Frances Coleman will pour tea.

The "two Islesford painters," Charles Edwin Kincaid and Harold B. Warren, have sent out cards for their twelfth annual studio exhibition of small landscapes of the locality, continuing through Wednesday, which always draw scores of people to the charming little island, whose fish wharves and lobster pots recall the simpler days when Mount Desert Island too was populated chiefly by fishermen and lumbermen.

CAMP MEETING FOR THE VINEYARD

EDGARTOWN, Mass.

SEASON-END activities on Martha's Vineyard are already looming, with dates set for a number of events traditionally accepted as climaxes. The Martha's Vineyard Camp Meeting Association will hold the island's ninety-fourth Camp Meeting Week from Aug. 24 to 31, with Governor's Day the centre of interest. This is the occasion of the yearly illumination of the historic camp grounds, an event which has a growing appeal to the Summer colony.

Dahlias are likely to prove the outstanding attraction at the annual flower show of the Martha's Vineyard Garden Club, to be held at the Edgartown Tennis Club on Tuesday, the ten classes for this flower promising to be well filled. A large number of gladioli entries are also foreseen in two special classes and there is keen interest in an unusually diversified group of classes for artistic arrangements. The proceeds of the show are to go for the benefit of ground planting at the Martha's Vineyard Hospital. On the committee are Mrs. T. M. R. Meikleham, club president; Mrs. Henry E. Davies, Mrs. Walter Bennet and Mrs. Percival Beresford, who will be floor manager.

Team races between the Vineyard Haven Yacht Club and the Beverly Yacht Club, to be held at Vineyard Haven tomorrow, in Herreshoff fifteen-footers, are the first of what it is hoped to make an annual series. A cup has been offered as a prize.

Sunday afternoon recitals by members of the Phidelah Rice company at the East Chop Playhouse, for the benefit of the Martha's Vineyard Hospital and other charities, are a popular feature of the month.

AT ALEXANDRIA

The Fishing Season Proves Good—A Formal Ball

ALEXANDRIA BAY, N. Y.

ANGLERS of the Thousand Islands colony are having a good season. Several have brought home the limit of black bass more than once in the past week. Charles G. Smith of New York, who is passing his forty-second Summer at this resort, brought home the limit of black bass to a boat—twenty-five—for three days in succession. Mrs. E. P. Decker of New York, his daughter, landed the largest walleyed pike of the season, her treasure weighing eight and one-half pounds.

On the Thousand Islands Yacht Club clay courts the annual tennis tournament for juniors will be held tomorrow, with Kenneth Bourne of New York, chairman of the tennis committee, in charge.

The annual formal ball of the Thousand Islands Yacht Club will be given in the ballroom of the club next Saturday evening. This affair will be the most brilliant event of the season and will be in charge of the yacht club entertainment committee, of which Edward J. Noble of Greenwich is the chairman, and Andrew McNally 3d of Chicago, vice chairman. There will be two orchestras to furnish the music, so that the dancing may be continuous. There will be many hosts at the supper party at midnight, among them Commodore and Mrs. Andrew McNally of Chicago, who will entertain for a large number of guests. Among the New Yorkers who will entertain on this occasion will be Mrs. John W. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Knight, Mrs. C. M. Englis, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Holmes, Severin Bourne, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Dewart.

The fourth in the series of cabaret dinner dances will be held at the Thousand Islands Yacht Club on Wednesday.

A NEW PLAY FOR SOUTHAMPTON

Fourth Production of Theatre Group This Week to Close Their Season—Many Musical Events

SOUTHAMPTON, L. I.

THE fourth production of the Hampton Players, "This Present Greatness," by Knowles Entrekin, will be presented at the Parrish Memorial Hall on Wednesday, and the concluding performance of the season will be given on Saturday. The play had its première on Tuesday at the Quogue Field Club, reversing the usual order of producing—first in Southampton, then Quogue and West Hampton and East Hampton. The author was present at the first performance.

Two actresses have joined the cast for the last play of the season—Miss Bessie Belmont, a Summer resident of Southampton, who has appeared with the Players in previous seasons, and Miss Mary Law of New York. These actresses and Albert Van Dekker and John Breeden have the major rôles in the new play. The Players are sponsoring an exhibition in the Memorial Hall of paintings by T. Currie-Bell, and examples of sculpture brought from a New York gallery. The exhibition, which was opened on Tuesday, will be continued until after Sept. 1. Mr. Currie-Bell, whose permanent establishment is now in New York, has exhibited in the Royal Scottish Academy at Edinburgh, at the Royal Academy in London, at the Walker Art Gallery in Liverpool and at galleries in various European cities. The Russian Government bought for the Leningrad Museum his "Portrait of an Algerian Man," exhibited in Munich.

Bernardo Olshansky, Russian baritone, will give his ninth annual recital in Southampton on Thursday afternoon at Parrish Memorial Hall, under the patronage of a large number of Summer colonists. The program will include two requests and several songs new to Mr. Olshansky's répertoire. He will sing also at the Maidstone Club in East Hampton during the season.

Another musical event of the week will be the third of a series of recitals by Mrs. Henry E. Coe at her home, the Appletrees. Mrs. Coe has done considerable research in music and has thus been able to present to her friends programs of songs which are rarely if ever heard elsewhere. She will give Saturday morning's program in costume.

On Tuesday afternoon Miss Harriette Cady will give her annual piano recital at the East Hampton studio of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Herter, with Southampton as well as East Hampton patronesses. Miss Cady's programs usually include some of her own compositions.

The third of a series of boxing bouts arranged by the Southampton Athletic Club will be held on Friday evening in the arena built near the high school. John Bradley is the president of the organization. Members of the Southampton and East Hampton Summer colonies have subscribed for boxes for the entire series.

The junior tennis tournaments for the Cameron, Babcock, Fox and Stafford Cups have been resumed at the Meadow Club, and must be finished before Sept. 15, according to rules posted. Miss Cathleen Fox has a leg on both the Cameron and Fox Cups, which must be won three times to become the property of the winner.

Members of the Suffolk hounds will meet weekly for drag hunts through the country until December. Most of the hunts have started from the Southampton Riding and Hunt Club, but this week's, to be run on Saturday, will start from the East Hampton Riding and Driving Club.

LAKE PLACID HORSE SHOW

First Event of Its Kind in Adirondacks Comes This Week—Many Entries

LAKE PLACID, N. Y.

ACTIVITIES in the Adirondacks for this season find a fitting climax in the first annual horse show sponsored by the Lake Placid Riding Club, which is scheduled for next Friday and Saturday. More than ordinary interest attaches to this show because it is the first ever to be held at an Adirondack resort centre and will actually demonstrate the degree of popularity likely to be attained by a horse show as an annual feature of the Adirondack season.

All indications point to the complete success of the event. Entries have been received from owners not only at Lake Placid but at other resort centres throughout the Adirondack region as well as from points down-State. The show grounds, located near the Lake Placid airport, are in the pink of condition, and facilities for spectators and the stabling of the mounts are considered highly satisfactory. Arrangements are progressing under the direction of the executive committee headed by R. Raymond F. Stevens, a local hotel man, who is also vice president of the Adirondack Resorts Association.

A note of interest has been added to the show through the issuance of special invitations to several prominent persons, for the most part long identified with the interests of the Adirondacks, including Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson and Mrs. Stimson, who are members of Ausable Club, where they are now spending the season; Governor Roosevelt, who is an enthusiastic admirer of the Adirondacks, and Mrs. Roosevelt; former Governor Alfred E. Smith and Mrs. Smith, and John H. Warner and Mrs. Warner.

In addition to the exhibitors' breakfast on the morning of the opening day and the Horse Show Ball on Saturday night, both at the Stevens House, there will be much entertaining on the part of members of the Lake Placid Summer colony, and a number of large house parties for the show will be formed by the campers and cottagers.

W. C. Bain of New York, manager of the show, is now here and is working with the members of the executive committee in the perfection of details. Prominent among the exhibitors will be John T. Deblois Wack of Briarcliff Manor and Westport-on-Lake Champlain; Dr. George C. Owens, president of the Lake Placid Riding Club; Mrs. Raymond F. Stevens, wife of the chairman of the executive committee; John W. Rumsey of Saranac Lake; a group of young women from Moss Lake Camp at Eagle Bay on the Fulton chain of lakes; Miss Phebe Warren of Troy; Edgar B. Bernhard, Malverne Farms, Horicon, N. Y., and Miss Betty May Mason of Malone.

A FEATURE will be the appearance of teams of about fifteen riders each from three units of the New York State Police. Captain C. J. Broadfield will command the detail from Troop B at Malone; Captain J. J. Keeley will command the unit from Troop G of Troy, showing in the classes for troopers and in those for hunters and jumpers, and Captain Stephen J. McGrath, the contingent from Troop D, Oneida, N. Y., giving an exhibit of rough riding.

Judges for the show include Richard V. Look of Montreal, for horses and ponies under saddle; J. Garner West, Garnerville, N. Y., for hunters and jumpers; Major George F. Chandler, Kingston, N. Y., former commander of the New York State Police, for the State Troopers classes. Outstanding among the trophies is an annual cup to be given by the third Olympic Winter Games committee, to become the property of the person winning it twice.

This week-end Westport-on-Lake Champlain is thronged alike with yachtsmen and golfers, the former there for the annual regatta of the Westport Club, in which almost all of the fastest boats on near-by waters are entered, and the golfers for the first annual invitation tournaments for men and women players for the Barksdale Cups given by Mrs. Hamilton M. Barksdale of Briarcliff Manor and New York. The finals in these tournaments will be played today on the championship course of the Westport Golf Club. In connection with both events there is much entertaining by members of the Westport colony. Last night there was the yachtsmen's ball, annually one of the most notable social features of the season, at the yacht clubhouse.

Adding to the social interest of this week-end at Westport is the presentation in Cutting Memorial Hall of the annual play by the young men of Camp Dudley, the Y. M. C. A. camp at Westport. The first performance was held last night and there will be a second tomorrow night. This season's production is "Be Nonchalant."

Many entries have been received for the annual Saranac Inn tennis matches starting tomorrow and continuing through next week. Also annual tennis events for seniors will be played throughout next week at the Lake Placid Club.

JERSEY'S BIG REGATTA ON TODAY

RED BANK, N. J.

THE famous Gold Cup Regatta on the Shrewsbury River is being held this week-end. A crowd of 25,000 is expected to witness the widely diversified boating contests on the program for today. At 11 A. M. intercollegiate classes of outboards will race in a single heat of two laps over five miles. At noon stock runabouts will compete over a seven-and-a-half-mile course. The early part of the afternoon will be given over to outboard contests and the hydroplane races will get under way at 1:45. The national sweepstakes, a grand free-for-all, scheduled for 4:40 o'clock will conclude the afternoon. Tomorrow evening the Red Bank Yacht Club will sponsor a dinner dance at the Molly Pitcher Hotel, tendered to the participants in the regatta.

Many of the horses which were shown at the Monmouth County Horse Show last week will again be seen for three days beginning tomorrow at Wilbur Buchsbaum's Boxwood Farms in Spring Lake, at an exhibition there.

Play toward the Essex and Sussex Cup and the Monmouth Trophy are to be held today at both the Spring Lake and the Homestead Golf Clubs, the matches having started.

The Governor's Ball will be held at the Monmouth Hotel in Spring Lake on Friday. Preceding the ball Governor Larson and a number of his guests will be entertained at a dinner party given by Joseph E. Smith Jr., manager of the hotel. This ball is one of the largest annual society events given at the shore.

The Challenge Golf Cup event is scheduled for Aug. 30 and the Vice President's Cup for Labor Day at the Rumson Country Club. For the women golfers there will be a three-day handicap medal play tournament on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. The women's championship tournament will be played during the week of Sept. 8.

The members of the Belmar Yacht Club will attend a covered dish luncheon tomorrow with Mrs. Burlington in charge. She will be assisted by Mrs. Robert Caplon and Mrs. Joseph Berg. On Wednesday evening this club will also sponsor a bridge party.

Colonial Hospitality In A Colonial Setting

Over the very territory in which The Sagamore—newest and smartest of resort hotels is located—Indian warriors and Colonists fought desperate battles for possession. The scenes of these battles are depicted on the walls of our Indian Stockade grill room.

In those days—Colonial Hospitality was a warm, living thing. Today—that spirit still prevails at The Sagamore.

Sport facilities include a Donald Ross 18-hole golf course, horses from the Kirkwood Hotel Stables, Camden, S. C., motor-boating, tennis and water sports. Indian Summer is a perfect time for using them. Spend your August or September vacation at The Sagamore.

LUCERNE IN QUEBEC

80,000 Acre . . .
Vacation Kingdom

In the romantic old Province of Quebec, rich with the vivid history of early French Canada, Lucerne-in-Quebec welcomes the lovers of outdoors.

Here, you will find abundant facilities for outdoor recreation . . . Tennis on 6 en-tout-cas courts . . . golf, yachting, riding, swimming, speedboating, fishing. And in the cool evenings, restful slumber, with the fragrant scent of pine and spruce in your nostrils.

Seigniorial Chateau Papineau, towered and turreted . . . now the Seigniory Club . . . is the center of gay social activity. Charter Life Membership brings the privilege of building your own log cabin home, on your own bit of wooded vacationland . . . and the moderate cost may be spread conveniently over the years.

No initiation fees or annual dues for Charter members.

An illustrated brochure fully describes the advantages of membership in Lucerne-in-Quebec Seigniory Club. Write for it today.

. . . . . . Visit the Log Lodge this Summer. . .

Within the rustic walls of the Log Lodge, harmony and an atmosphere of yesteryear charm are attained thru the equipment of all rooms with furniture of quaint Provincial design.

The balconied dining room, overlooking the Ottawa River and Valley . . . the spacious ballroom . . . the fountain grill-room . . . the cozy Old English Tavern . . . exotic Terrace Garden . . . each intrigues the guest with its distinctive appeal.

A beautifully illustrated booklet tells the full story of this inviting rustic hotel. Write for it today!

WORLD CRUISE

It has a 137-day itinerary of high-spots, every port in its springtime. It has the distinguished Empress of Australia, 21,850 gross tons, with her New York-Paris cuisine and service. The "extra" is Canadian Pacific's world-wide organization, its on-the-spot prestige and entree... leaving you nothing but to enjoy. 8th season... From New York, Dec. 2. As low as $2000. Ask for booklets, ship plans.

MEDITERRANEAN

Here also, on this 73-day Mediterranean cruise-epic, is Canadian Pacific's famous "extra." The great Empress of France, yacht-like white liner, takes you to 47 sunshine ports, from New York, next Feb. 3. Her Empress service and cuisine are a delectable thrill. 8th season. Book now, for as low as $900. Ask for booklets, ship plans.

FAMOUS CRUISE SHIP "SHAWNEE"

Pack up and join the "happy-go-luckies" on this amazing vacation cruise. Sing, dance, laugh and rollick your way through the gayest twelve days you've ever known. And, to add to the merriment, the completeness of the trip—you'll sail on the new cruise liner "SHAWNEE", a masterpiece of ship construction, and as absorbing a play place as any vacation resort on dry land.

NO HOTELS TO WORRY ABOUT

Once you park your baggage on the "SHAWNEE", you've nothing more to worry about. No hurried hunting for hotels . . . the ship's your hotel, and a finer hostelry you never put up at. No matter where you go—while you're marvelling at the splendor of the mighty St. Lawrence, or the brilliance of the ever-changing Saguenay . . . as you hold your breath at the Old World beauty of Montreal, or the French charm of Quebec, as you live in the Evangeline country at Halifax—your hotel jogs right along with you, so to speak. You'll find it a distinct pleasure, and a handy one, too, to have your headquarters right where you are all the time . . . and there are so many interesting things to do aboard "your hotel" all the way. Visit all of these places . . . see and do all of these things!

SOMETHING DOING EVERY MINUTE

With your jolly, well-met cruise-mates, you'll enter into the spirit of things with an enthusiasm born of the free life of the sea. Deck sports, horse racing, Orchestra, concerts and dancing, the rythm of the newest jazz tunes, masquerade ball, afternoon teas, bridge parties, etc. . . . and what a time you'll have at the farewell dinner. Just write, phone or drop in personally and arrange your reservations . . . but do it early to be sure of choice accommodations. Handsome booklet will be sent upon request.

SHOVE OFF! Heave to! Anchors aweigh! Full speed ahead!

Say it any way you want, but the main idea is to get going on this absorbing 12-Day cruise that sets you down on the rugged coast of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

Live in the glories of a region where man-made conveniences have not detracted from the natural beauty of the years . . . where the tang of the balsam reaches deep into your lungs . . . where days overflow with sunshine . . . and nights produce sleep that "keeps you put".

Swim in salt or fresh water. Follow the ball over new and interesting courses. Angle for "big ones" in swift-rushing streams, or shade-dappled pools. Motor through a "different" region.

Eight full days at sea, on a rollicking nautical house-party. Two days each at Halifax and St. Johns, using the ship as your hotel. And what a hotel! Famous cruise-ships "Nerissa" and "Fort St. George"—with traditional "Furness" service all the way.

Sailings every Saturday from Pier 74, North River. Connections at St. John's for S. S. Rosalind to Montreal.

"THE VEENDAM" Going

"THE BERMUDA" Returning

TWO Transatlantic Experiences on your BERMUDA Vacation

THIS year Bermuda vacationists can enjoy two distinct ocean experiences—one Dutch, one British.

Those leaving on Wednesdays will step right into the spic and span welcome of a great liner, new to the Bermuda service but renowned in the Transatlantic run. Chartered from the Holland-America Line, the "Veendam" is Dutch from stem to stern—with all that means in solid sea-going comfort, in nimble service and in wholesome food. A real two-day Transatlantic taste, this "Veendam" voyage. And a most convenient sailing day for out-of-towners or those who'd like to spend a few days packing and shopping before the trip.

Those returning on the "Bermuda" have another Transatlantic treat in store. As British as Bermuda itself, this famous motorship, too, promises a gala round of dances, bridge parties, entertainments, deck games. Topped off with "gym" sessions, swimming and all the little niceties of true Transatlantic travel.

IMPORTANT TO NOTE: "Veendam" and "Bermuda" sail from Manhattan Pier 95 (West 55th St.) and go direct to dock at Hamilton (Bermuda) thus avoiding inconvenience of five mile transfer from anchorage.

ALL-EXPENSE TOURS

5 Days	$ 76
8 Days	$ 94
9 Days	$100
12 Days	$118

Including ship and hotel accommodations.
Series of sightseeing trips for $11

Sailings every Wednesday on S. S. "Veendam" and every Saturday on M. S. "Bermuda."

What are you looking for on your vacation? Bermuda has it . . . plus.

Climate? Far out at sea—not in the tropics—Bermuda's summer average of 77° is more comfortable than many resorts in the States. Sports? Places here that bring chuckles of delight to golf pros and tennis champs. Horseback, sailing, driving, fishing, too,—and of the finest. Bathing? You haven't really bathed until you've stepped from a "talcum-powder" beach into breakers tinted like bursting bubbles. Social life? The dances, the teas, the hotel activities become one grand party as formalities melt away in the infectious Bermuda atmosphere.

If it's scenery you're looking for, there's no sight as soothing as these white roofed hamlets, cradled in pastel hillsides. And no natural wonders more thrilling than the undersea gardens and famous crystal caves of Bermuda. As for peace and quiet—with autos and factories taboo, you hear only the soft cloppety-clop of horses' hoofs, the cheery calls of passing cyclists and the murmur of the breeze through the palms.

Sound good? Look over the low rates and get your reservations started.

A CHANGING NATION REVEALED BY THE CENSUS

Since 1920 New Forces Have Operated to Cause Migrations of People to Growing Industrial Centres Scattered Over the Country—Old Drift to the West Has Been Broken Up—Effect of Automobile

By R. L. DUFFUS.

THE census figures of 1930 would be easy to grasp if we could imagine ourselves going up so high in an airplane that we could see the whole United States at once and carrying with us a telescope so powerful that we could see all the houses and people between the two oceans. If then, perhaps with Professor Einstein's aid, we were able to compress the population movements of the past ten years into the space of an hour or two we should be looking down on some very complicated eddies, currents and slack backwaters in the human tide that is rising over the United States. Nearly 17,000,000 individuals would be diffusing themselves over the land, but no longer with that comparatively simple westward drift which marked the early years of the Republic.

If, with some further cooperation from Professor Einstein, we could swiftly resurvey the movements shown in the earlier censuses, from 1790 on, we should see the westward-bound millions pouring through the passes of the Alleghenies, with thinner streams diverging to follow the ranges southward into West Virginia, the Western Carolinas, Georgia and Tennessee. We should see Kentucky, Ohio, Western New York, Indiana and Illinois filling up, and settlement advancing into Michigan and Wisconsin. We should see the advance to the Great Bend of the Missouri, where for many years the westward march was held up because everything beyond was Indian territory.

The Old Trails West.

We should see the trails, thinly traveled at first, then black with human ants, running to Oregon, Washington, California and the Southwest. We should see the Middle West expanding after the Civil War, with Kansas and Nebraska as the nuclear States. We should witness the rise of Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, the slower evolution of the great ranching States of the plains, and fierce swirls of humanity where the precious metals were brought to light in the Sierras and the Rocky Mountains. The coal of Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia, the iron and copper of the Lake Superior region and the copper of Arizona, the oil of Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Texas and California would produce disturbances in the pattern hardly less dramatic.

So thrilling would be these changes that we might for a time fail to notice the ceaseless activity along the eastern seaboard, where great cities and their satellite communities were growing fat on the commerce of Europe and the raw materials of the West. But in looking westward first we might be following a proper impulse. It was the growth of the West that enriched the nation. The West did not stand for particular products, however. It stood for opportunity. There lay wealth, to be had almost for the taking. Men went west to take it; by what means was a secondary matter. The age of intense specialization had not dawned.

Four Decades of Migration.

The westward migration was almost purely a geographical phenomenon. With a relief map in front of us we might, at any time after 1850, have laid down the lines it was to follow. But the No Trespass sign was tacked up over the last great tract of free land when Oklahoma was opened in 1890. After that date people no longer drifted aimlessly westward. They had to go where they could get a foothold. Mostly they either had to have capital or to be willing to work for those who did have it.

So the pattern of migration changed. Opportunity was no longer a geographical factor. It became more and more an economic factor. Moreover, as agriculture declined in relative importance, industry began to exert a stronger and stronger pull. The foot-loose masses of population were no longer drawn, like moths, into the setting sun. Great numbers of them answered the call of the machine. The old forces continued to operate. The West, for the most part, added steadily to its numbers. But the new forces were the more powerful.

Machines as a Factor.

And it is these new forces that have come more than ever into their own since 1920. It is the machines, and not the beaver or the buffalo, the untouched acres waiting for the plough, nor the undiscovered riches of the mountains, that have done most to determine, within the past ten years, where we should go when we moved.

At first there may seem to be some contradiction between this fact and the further fact that the most dramatic population shifts of the decade have been largely caused by the desire for pleasure and easier ways of living. But the possibility of realizing this desire is a by-product of the machine age. The machine produced a national surplus where the older methods did not. California and Florida are in a sense dependencies of Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Detroit and New York. They have become more important as places to spend wealth than as places to make it. In saying this one does not minimize their actual and undeniable productivity.

Showing the Relative Growth by States of Population as Revealed by the 1930 Census.

If, however, their climates and scenery had been less satisfying, they certainly would have grown less rapidly. There seems to be something in the American temperament which craves palms and orange trees. In Florida and California they existed in abundance. And, measuring growth by percentages, California with an increase of 65.5 per cent and Florida with an increase of 51.4 per cent headed the list of American States for the past decade.

So far as California is concerned, this was the result of a new westward movement, with the risks and hardships mostly eliminated. The population of the State is not made up entirely of people living in elegant leisure. Nevertheless, it was the play motive rather than the work motive that brought them to the Pacific. We cannot measure the increase in the State's production between 1920 and 1930, for the 1930 figures for manufacturing and agriculture have not yet been checked up. But if we take the period between 1919 and 1927 we find a rate of increase in industrial output of less than 40 per cent, as compared with the population growth of 65.5 per cent. Much of this would have to be charged to oil, which has been found in California in many spots which in 1920 were not known to possess anything but climate. We must not forget fruit-growing, of course. But fruit ranches cannot be expanded like automobile factories. They demand water, and California's water supply is not limitless. It is only the climate that is limitless.

Florida, industrially, made a poorer showing than California. Between 1919 and 1927 its industrial output grew less than 3 per cent, while its consumption of raw materials actually dropped off a little. Its fruits, like California's, became and remained important. But its principal asset was the fact that the Winters in the North are cold and disagreeable. It drew and held the sun worshipers.

It drew them to particular spots where the sun worshiping was good. There are two Florida counties that gained 284 and 233 per cent, respectively. But there are twelve counties that lost population. Miami gained 273 per cent, Orlando 194 per cent, West Palm Beach 207 per cent. But one city, Key West, actually lost more than 32 per cent. The sources of the State's prosperity were changing in kind and in location. The main source is now weather.

The seven other States which made population gains of more than 20 per cent are, in the order of their gains: Michigan with 32 per cent, Arizona with 30.4 per cent, New Jersey with 27.6 per cent, Texas with 24.8 per cent, North Carolina with 23.9 per cent, Oregon with 21.6 per cent, and New York with 21.5 per cent. And now we come to a more diversified and even confusing part of our picture, since there is in each case a different reason for the increase. That is, there is one outstanding reason in addition to the several reasons—chief among them the tendency of the human race to multiply—which give the Census Bureau's machines more adding to do at each recount.

Michigan has grown because of the development of the automobile industry, mainly in and around Detroit. The Ford plants alone probably support a population of at least 500,000 men, women and children—or nearly one-half of the total increase since 1920. From Detroit a long, thin filament reaches out to the copper mines of Arizona. Copper, climate and the slow spread of irrigation tell the story of Arizona's new 100,000 residents.

New Jersey grows for the same reason that New York grows; ten years from now it will probably have a larger increase to record. Around the great Port of New York, though it still falls short of its limitless possibilities, the commerce of the nation comes to tidewater. No blunders of government, no defects in past planning, no economic depressions, seem able to hold back this growth of the metropolitan region, which contains within its limits, from Fairfield County, Conn., to the mountains of New Jersey and trans-Hudson New York, nearly 10 per cent of the population of the United States. In this region we see the culmination of the full circle of American energies. The tides of settlement flowed westward; now there are currents setting eastward again, bearing with them the fabulous loot of the continent.

But New York State itself, though its bulk increase in population was greater than that of any State except California, falls in percentage of gain below Texas, North Carolina and—by a small fraction—Oregon. Texas, of course, spells oil more than any other commodity—oil nowadays instead of long-horn cattle. Dallas, Fort Worth and Houston have sprouted modern skyscrapers; their bank clearings mount, though the tourist in search of romance passes them by on his way to San Antonio and El Paso. North Carolina, with its 23.9 per cent increase, and South Carolina, with only 2.9 per cent, reveal vividly the story of the old South and the new. The textile mills of North Carolina make the mill owners of New England worry—unless, indeed, those same New Englanders have picked up their mills and moved them South. The State has a truly Yankee bustle.

Nor is everything measured by dollars and cents. The University of North Carolina is one of the intellectual centres of the country, with an influence reaching far beyond its borders. He who strolls along the tranquil waterfront of Charleston, least spoiled of the old Confederate cities, may wonder if South Carolina has not chosen the wiser course. Yet there can be no doubt that just as one looks on the South of the past in Charleston and to some extent in the charming city of Savannah, a few hours' ride to the southward, so one sees the South of the future in North Carolina.

The growth of the South is spotty because industry there is following trails, just as settlement once did. Where industry has not entered in sufficient force the boll weevil and the migrations of the Negro have brought about a relative decline. Thus Georgia gained only 0.2 per cent—a little more than 100,000 in ten years out of a population which now is nearly 3,000,000. But Georgia itself is spotty. Atlanta gained 32.[illegible] per cent, the little city of Decatur 115.9 per cent, the slightly larger city of Rome 63.5 per cent, and peaceful Savannah, with its broad avenues, divided by strips of well-shaded grass, gained 5.4 per cent. But more than two-thirds of the Georgia counties actually lost population. Five counties lost more than 40 per cent. Some of the State's normal increase of population was moving away. The rest of it was coming into the cities and towns.

This tendency is not sectional. It happens wherever agriculture is doing poorly and also wherever better methods of cultivation enable fewer farmers to produce the same or a greater amount of food. In New England the three northern States—Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont—made an average gain of 3.7 per cent. The other three gained an average of 13.4 per cent. If New England were treated as a single State its rate of gain would match fairly closely that of Kansas, the Dakotas, Nebraska, Iowa and Minnesota, similarly grouped.

Decline in New England.

But the New England farm lands are falling behind more rapidly than the Middle Western. What holds up the New England average is the industrial development in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

But it is a peculiarity of New England industry that many older enterprises are slipping or barely holding their own. Bristol, Conn., gained 37.7 per cent, the important city of Bridgeport only 2.5 per cent. Manchester, N. H., another manufacturing city, lost a little. The gain of the city of Providence, R. I., was less than half that of the State. So we see that people are not only going from the farms to the cities but that they are also going from certain cities and certain industries to other cities and other industries. And industries themselves migrate until they arrive at some strategic crossroads where their essential raw materials and the roads to their best markets intersect.

The map is dotted with centres of intense activity, often only a few miles from areas from which population is receding. Hopewell, Va., has but 11,325 inhabitants, but it has gained 710 per cent since 1920. Jackson, Miss., gained 100 per cent; the old and lovely city of Natchez only 6.2 per cent, and a number of Mississippi counties lost. Ten Maryland counties lost, though Baltimore County gained 65.5 per cent. Fifty-eight Indiana counties lost. The city of Terre Haute dropped 5.4 per cent. But Gary gained more than 80 per cent, Hammond nearly 80 per cent, Mishawaka 88.4 per cent, four others more than 40 per cent. Every time a new industry establishes itself or an old one begins to boom it sets up a migratory movement.

Drift Is Changing.

The old westward drift is broken up. The automobile has put the nation on wheels. There is no longer that almost automatic, mothlike pushing after the sun that characterized our history within the memory of living men. A considerable part of our population is nomadic, whether in search of pleasure, of opportunity, or of both. It has become well-informed as to what it will find when it travels in a particular direction. In times of unemployment it often loads its portable possessions into the family flivver and goes seeking work where work may conceivably be found.

So the simple, majestic patterns of old are broken up into whirling lines so intricate that no one may pretend to follow them. They take shape only when some new opportunity appears on the horizon, when oil is struck, when automobile manufacturers set out to make us a nation of two-car families, when there is a land boom in Florida, when work is begun on some great undertaking like the Boulder Dam, when it is found that dates or cotton can be grown in the Imperial Valley, when the hill people of Tennessee are told that they can live less lonely lives if they will come down to the textile mills in the valleys.

Today's Movements.

Certain major movements do, indeed, emerge. There is still a westward movement, though it is one which neglects Montana, Idaho and Wyoming, goes to Nevada chiefly because divorce is easy there, pauses only fractionally in the magnificent valley of Utah, and prefers Arizona to New Mexico and California to Washington and Oregon. There is a southward movement, though it passes by whole States or picks out urban sections of States—Atlanta, Birmingham, Columbia, S. C.; Charleston, W. Va.; Charlottesville, not Richmond, Va. There is, relatively, a movement away from the corn lands and wheat lands of the Mississippi Valley and toward the outer rim, as though the spinning of the traffic on the national highways exerted a centrifugal force.

We must still look to the South and West for our next period of development. But the great unanimous migrations are over. The herdsmen of our national destiny have rounded us up. We mill about in such pastures as we have, not stampeding beyond the rivers and the ranges but picking up the succulent morsels of herbage that in our hurry we previously overlooked.

HUMAN ASPECTS OF THE DROUGHT IN THE PARCHED FARMLANDS

Behind the Dull Statistics Lurk Tragedy, Pathos and Sometimes a Grim Humor

IN what follows there is presented the human aspects of the drought—vignettes of life in the afflicted areas. The article is based on reports from Times correspondents in the twelve States in which the burden was felt most heavily.

WHAT will long be remembered as the great dry year of 1930 has brought the farmers of a dozen American States face to face with conditions more suggestive of the bad years in India and China than of anything that has happened within the memory of living men in the very heart of the land of plenty. Rural America has suffered more from overproduction than from dearth. Now over the safe and comfortable lives of perhaps 1,000,000 farm families hangs the shadow not only of crop failure but of an actual water famine. The fundamentals of their existence have been shaken. The earth and sky have failed them.

Statistics tell part of the story but behind the statistics are hundreds of thousands of individuals each trying to meet as best he can an unprecedented emergency. Incidents tragic, pathetic and sometimes humorous come to the notice of the observer who dips here and there into the vast sere area stretching from Western Pennsylvania to Northern Louisiana and from Virginia to Eastern Nebraska, with an additional island of aridity lying across Montana and Idaho. When water is guarded like wine; when the leaves in early August turn brown and fall from the branches; when mosquitos swarm out of the dried-up marshes to plague people like a curse of Egypt; when one can walk dry-shod on what is normally part of the bottoms of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers—then the whole tenor of life changes.

In several States the ringing of bells has called people to church in the middle of the week to pray for rain. From West Virginia comes the report that some persons believe that the Almighty is punishing the nation for its sins, and that some are convinced that mankind is about to be destroyed by drought as it was in the time of Noah by floods. In parts of West Virginia sheep may be bought for a dollar a head or less. Motorists on country roads in the arid districts are not only unable to obtain water from the inhabitants, but are besought to bring out drinking water in five-gallon jugs from their city homes.

In the Old Dominion it is declared that the rich Valley of Virginia has been more ravaged by the drought than it was when Sheridan's troopers rode through it during the Civil War with orders to leave nothing that would keep a crow alive. In Fairfax County highway workers in the broiling sun were refused drinking water because the farmers had barely enough for their urgent domestic needs. The wells at the marine base at Quantico went dry temporarily, and 50,000 gallons of water had to be brought in by boat from Hampton.

The Plight of Kentucky.

The Great Meadow of Kentucky, where cattle once stood knee-deep in blue grass and the music of running water could be heard almost everywhere, is now described as "a sere and withered caricature" of what it was in its days of lushness. One Kentucky town has used up all its water and is being supplied by daily water trains from Louisville. In some communities well-to-do persons are buying ice and melting it down for drinking water. Eighty-five out of the State's 120 counties have felt the blight, and the money loss is estimated at from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000.

From Arkansas comes the story of a family of seven which in good years could wring a living from its little hill farm. This year the drought burned up the field crops and destroyed the kitchen garden. All that was left was a single apple tree. When the case was discovered the mother, father and five children had been living for two weeks on a diet of fried green apples. When the apples are eaten up they must starve or depend upon charity.

The hill farmers of Arkansas weeks ago gave up all attempt to wring a crop out of the iron ground and took to hunting and fishing for their food supply. But the fish are dying in the stagnant pools of what were once fine trout streams, and even the squirrels and rabbits are sometimes found dead from lack of food. Because the Arkansas farmers cannot secure food rich enough in vitamin content the dreaded pellagra, a deficiency disease, is spreading.

The citizens of Indiana, who live on the border of the afflicted districts, are able to look at the situation with more equanimity. A story is told of an Indianapolis business man who owns and rents a farm some hundred miles from his home. Late one night last week his tenant called him on the long-distance phone and said, "Ed, our well's gone dry. What shall I do?" "What do you want me to do about it?" snapped the irritated landowner. "Send you down a bucket of water?" And he slammed down the receiver.

At Petersburg, Ind., a grocer found a chick hopping about one morning on the top of a basket of eggs. It had been hatched by the heat as effectively as the job could have been done by its mother's feathered body. A similar report comes from Quitman, Ga., where a mother hen, overcome by the heat, left her nest, and the eggs hatched out spontaneously two days later. It was at Quitman, also, if no one has falsified the record, that a field of popcorn—a small one, to be sure—popped on the stalk a few days ago.

In Evansville, Ind., the city established a water "filling station," to which tank wagons were sent for the purpose of carrying water to the near-by farmers. This water is furnished without cost. But water is not always to be had for nothing. Sidney Gilroy, a Cincinnati printer, related on his return from a trip through Southern Ohio and West Virginia that he had been obliged to pay nearly as much for the water he required for his radiator as he did for his gasoline. "And I have lived on the Ohio River," he added, after telling this story, "and seen billions of gallons pass by." In the southwest part of Edgar County, Ill., water is said to have gone up to a dollar a barrel.

In some sections of Southern Illinois processions of automobiles and horse-drawn vehicles, loaded with milk cans, barrels and kettles, were seen going to and from the stations where water might be had. In such cases all thought of using the water to save even a small portion of the vegetable gardens was abandoned. There is barely enough for family and stock, and sometimes there is little left over for bathing or washing clothes. When the stock cannot be fed and watered it has to be sold, usually at a heavy loss. Many a dairy herd in the afflicted regions has been turned into beef.

"I have chopped down bushes and small trees," states James Mead, a farmer living near Cincinnati, "in order to let the cattle eat the green leaves and thus to keep them from starving while we hoped and prayed for rain. Many birds are dying for lack of food. The seeds of weeds even have failed to ripen. Apples have literally been cooked on the trees. We are hauling water three miles."

Ohio Streams Fall.

In Southern Ohio many of the surface springs and streams have failed, and in some parts of this district hunters have found birds and small game which had died of thirst. Fortunately Ohio is largely underlaid with rocks containing a never-failing supply of water, and wells drilled to sufficient depth have not gone dry. A relatively minor annoyance has been the appearance of swarms of mosquitos, which have invaded even the cities and made sleep at times almost impossible.

Curiously enough, exactly the opposite phenomenon is reported from Indiana. Frank Wallace, Indiana State Entomologist, finds that the drying up of many streams and pools has considerably reduced the mosquito population. He also believes that the progress of the corn borer has been arrested, partly from the absence of any corn to bore. From Nebraska comes the plaintive lament that "While the supply of corn on the cob has been ample there doesn't seem to have been a really first class roasting ear in the lot." Nebraska farmers have been giving up their telephones as a measure of economy and circuses touring the Corn Belt have found it hard to drum up enough trade to meet their payrolls.

Optimists have found some compensating features in the universal affliction. Indiana residents on the Ohio River have been able to satisfy their curiosity as to what the bottom of the river looks like, for considerable areas of mud flats have been left exposed by the withdrawing of the water to a thin stream in the middle of the bed. In Wayne County the superintendent of the highway department thriftily took advantage of the low stage of streams to recondition the abutments of many bridges. He reports that because he did not have to pump away any water to get at the structures he saved about 75 per cent of the normal cost of the operation.

Along the Missouri River in Nebraska there are numerous cut-off lakes formed in past times by changes in the river's course. In normal times these are favorite resorts for picnic parties. This year they have dwindled to muddy pools. But this has brought into vogue the new sport of mud fishing. This game consists of knocking the bottom out of a small tub or pail, clapping it over a fish found struggling in the turbid water and then capturing the prize with bare hands. The process does not find favor with sportsmen, but it is effective.

In Omaha the heat spell brought out one ironic incident. Unemployment has been severely felt there as in other cities because of the industrial depression. When the thermometer was near its top limit a call came to the city employment bureau for men to move coal for a firm which was prudently stocking up for next Winter. The forty or fifty men who come daily to the bureau in the hope of getting odd jobs contested eagerly for the work.

THEY SAY—

By BERTRAND DAWSON,
Baron of Penn, Physician to King George V.

In a speech to the Canadian Club meeting on liquor control held in Montreal.

IT is common ground that some public control of the sale of alcoholic beverages is needed, with a view to securing moderation in consumption and proper standards of quality and strength. * * * The abandonments of prohibition have resulted from the realization that legislative restraints which exceed the sanctions of public opinion fail, are regarded as tyrannies, and thereby create reactions contrary to public weal. That legislation which first regards public opinion and then guides it gets furthest. * * *

Promote education in the art of living. Governments should lead often, and coerce seldom. * * * Coercion over this question means defiance followed by defeat.

I would not have you think that in my opinion alcohol is a necessity of every man's existence. There are many men who are better or equally well without it, just as there are men better without meat, and others better without, say, sweets or without cigarettes. It is unanimously agreed that the child and the adolescent should not take alcohol. Alcohol is not a necessity of existence, but an attribute of the art of living, and taking man as a social being it can add in a unique way to his health and content.

We take alcohol because it adds to the relish and aids the digestion of our food when we are a bit weary, a bit fed up with the day's strivings. * * * Alcohol gets the mind out of the groove left by the concentration on the day's work and helps it to roam over pastures new, brightens the outlook, brings cheerfulness and content and aids preparations for the next day's duties. It further rids the sensitive man of his inhibitions, and sets his mind and tongue free.

This prompts me to my next theme, how to get all this good and eschew the evil? For your blood constantly to contain alcohol deteriorates your tissues and therefore your health. What emerges? That alcohol must not be oft repeated, or taken strong, and it must be free of the deleterious impurities so rife in prohibition countries.

To talk of substitutes for the juice of the grape is an impiety.

By COL. CHAS. A. LINDBERGH,

In an address at the Williamstown Conference of the Institute of Politics on "National Air Policies."

IN the past few years commercial aviation in this country has progressed faster than in any other country in the world.

As experience has been developed, however, and as our craft have been improved we find that this country's interest is not alone in communication between the various States by air, but that one of our most important interests is better communication with other countries, at this time particularly, I think, with Mexico and Central and South America.

When the foreign lines from the United States to the south were first started we found a great lack of uniformity in regulations. * * * There are still great opportunities to make the carrying of passengers and express a great deal more valuable, a great deal faster than at the present time, if we can obtain a standard set of regulations, obtain a simpler series of forms to be filled out in international transport.

In many instances it is almost impossible for the private flier making an international trip by air to learn in advance the conditions he will encounter, both in regard to air routes and also to the regulations and restrictions laid down by the various countries he expects to fly through. * * * I believe that anything that can be done at the present time to draw attention to the necessity of uniform regulations, of encouraging air transport and individual flying, internationally, is of as great importance as any problem now confronting the development of aviation.

By F. G. BLANDFORD,
Lecturer on English Pronunciation,

Speaking at Cambridge University on the value of good speech.

PEOPLE regard good speech as good manners. The principle in pronunciation is to give the least shock to the least number. Supposing you met a crossing-sweeper who unexpectedly spoke the same dialect as we are hearing now, you would refer to him as being a very well-spoken young man. Similarly, if a Prime Minister spoke like the average crossing-sweeper you would call it a rough accent. On the whole, women are more pliable in this way. * * * Many maids talk standard English to their mistresses and lapse into a fruity Cockney immediately they get back to the kitchen.

The King and the Prince do not talk the same type of English, and an analysis of the Prince of Wales's pronunciation gives evidence of a very particular change. Yet the social environment and the outlook on life of the King and the Prince are the same. The pronunciation of the Prince is that of a young man and the King and Queen talk a perfectly different type of English. That is an indication of change. * * * I think the ideal accent is that which betrays neither your mother's birthplace nor your father's income.

By Dr. C. W. KIMMINS,
Specialist in Children's Ailments.

Addressing Cambridge University Summer School on tests of the sense of humor.

IN this experiment I examined 1,000 funny stories written by London school children and 1,500 written by New York school children. I found that American children have a very distinctive sense of humor. At one school in New York no less than 53 per cent gave accounts of the writings of Artemus Ward, Bret Harte and Mark Twain, principally Mark Twain. In the papers I examined there were more references to Charles Dickens than in the 1,000 papers I had from London children. They love Dickens far more in America than they do in England.

The American children delight in telling stories about things that have happened to people in England, especially politicians. One 12-year-old told a story of a man who risked his life to save another from drowning, and who told the coroner, 'I looked carefully to make quite sure it was not Lloyd George, and then I pulled him out.'

By J. B. PRIESTLY.
Author of "The Good Companions."

In a talk to teachers at the City of London vacation course.

DURING the last ten years many people have been saying that this is not a time for literature—many even of those engaged in the profession of letters. Here we have this new world, full of chaos and of political, social and economic conflict. Everything is in the melting-pot. In America and in Russia we have two new and strange civilizations. The rate of human movement has been enormously accelerated since the war.

In all this conflict and tumult there seems to be little place for the art of letters. But I believe with all my heart and soul, not as a professional author but as a private person, that literature was never more important than it is today. In literature you get as in nothing else a picture of the whole man—not the economic man, or man as the doctor or the dentist sees him, or as the traffic expert sees him, something to be moved about, but the whole complete human individual. We are living in a world in which the whole man is tending to disappear.

The world is extremely hard on the individual, and the individual human being has less and less chance of asserting himself in it in all the fullness of character. In Russia, with its State autocracy; in America, with its standardization of habits and thought, the individual has very little chance. Life everywhere becomes more and more complicated, more and more organized, and in carrying out the tasks of life we tend to think more and more of our fellow-creatures as automata and not as human beings.

By THOMAS D. CAMPBELL,
Owner of World's Largest Private Farm.

In a statement summarizing observations made in an eight-week tour of Russia.

I WAS invited into Russia to help develop the country's State-owned mechanized farms. I was paid a good, fat fee. I was allowed to go anywhere and see everything. I found the Russian farms doing splendidly—on great tracts of land, working night and day and completely mechanized, just as we are in Hardin, Mont. I had only a few things to criticize.

You know communism and education don't work together, and I told them that. Twelve years from now, when their industrial machine is fully grown and developing, you won't see much communism there. Even now the best workers get the best pay and the best living conditions.

Three years from now Russia probably will be in a position to export wheat, but I figure the country's rising requirements will take so much of its rising production that nobody should be worried. That is certainly true of oil and gasoline production. You must remember Russia is a country with natural resources as large as those of the United States and Canada combined. A country like that, with its millions of people, can't be ignored.

Already Russia can export manufactured goods here and undersell our own producers.

It does not pay labor anywhere near what we pay workmen, yet Russian labor is undoubtedly better off today than it was under the old Czarist régime.

By LORD EUSTACE PERCY,
Member of the British Parliament.

In a lecture at the Williamstown Institute of Politics.

ONE view is that a new deed of partnership has been drawn up in the Kellogg pact which makes war so unlikely that the rights of belligerents may be regarded as a thing of the past. It is difficult to judge whether any one really holds the view that the pact has rendered war impossible. It may seem captious to complain that the pact, while pledging its signatories to respect the Sixth Commandment, omitted to call their attention to the Tenth, but it is nevertheless true that the wording of the pact does really miss the point.

War is seldom deliberately planned. It is usually not so much a crime as a judgment upon crime. The crime lies in policies of "holy selfishness," which have never been so frankly avowed as by some of the signatories of the pact at the present moment.

The pact has much the same uses and virtues as a party platform at an election. * * *

It may all too easily become a sort of medieval shrine to which nations can promise a wax candle while indulging their usual ambitions. This tendency to put one's trust in a kind of election platform is one to which American policy seems particularly liable. * * *

It is obvious that the United States, Brazil and Russia, none of whom is a member of the League, will retain their neutral rights. * * * We have not made war impossible because we have issued a solemn declaration against it. We have not abolished the problem of neutrality because we have erected a rule of law which ignores it.

FOOTNOTES ON A WEEK'S HEADLINERS

"Alfalfa Bill."

CHAIN stores, synchronized movies, coast-to-coast radio networks and other uniform contraptions may do their part in making every one else alike, but we still must have our characters. Meet, therefore, Alfalfa Bill, who may be the next Governor of Oklahoma. He was nominated by the Democrats last week over a field of nine, which included three ex-Governors and took in one former Governor made an "ex" by impeachment; and if there are more Democrats in that politically mercurial State than Republicans, and there usually are, then the Hon. William Henry Murray, a Scotsman born in Texas and adopted by the Chickasaw Indians, will be Oklahoma's Chief Executive.

A half-generation ago Alfalfa Bill served a term or two at Washington in the House of Representatives, where, with his walrus mustache, flowing coats and equally flowing phrases, he was a picturesque figure. He had a clarion voice and a silver tongue which enriched The Congressional Record. Turn, for instance, to the occasion when he fought single-handed the Kentucky State delegation upon the delights of tobacco.

"My stimulant, sir, is tobacco, smoked in the form of a cigar or pipe. I know the gentleman objects to that because he smokes cigarettes, which I despise. There is not enough tobacco in them. Kentucky cannot deny that it outstrips all the rest of the Union for tobacco and Colonels. The State is full of Colonels and the Colonels are full of corn and tobacco."

Ever since Oklahoma became a State, Alfalfa Bill has been a part of its political scenery.

"I've had so many nicknames attached to me one time or another," he says, "that I had to select one myself, one that I preferred to be known by. So I took 'Alfalfa Bill'—given me because I delivered so many speeches on how to grow alfalfa, and, incidentally, I've made more agricultural speeches than I have political speeches. There's a county called for me—Alfalfa. Another is named Murray. There's a Murray Creek, a Murray School of Agriculture, and I don't know how many babies called Murray."

After the war Alfalfa Bill attempted to establish a colony of Oklahomans on a tract of land set aside by Bolivia. It failed disastrously. The colonists were uncertain whether the tract was land or water and Bolivia and Paraguay are still uncertain as to which country owns it.

Years softened the blow, however, with the result that the ten-gallon hat and clarion tones of Alfalfa Bill are once more abroad in the State, campaigning with this theme song, chanted to the tune of "Turkey in the Straw":

The plain common people will never be still Till Alfalfa Murray is Governor Bill.

YESTERDAY the Leviathan brought a kindly, familiar figure. A generous white mustache, a little goatee, a blue and white polka dot bow tie, twinkling eyes beneath a battered blue yachting cap—none other than Sir Thomas Lipton.

He has designs upon a silver object called a cup that is really a pitcher. With the hope of owning it he has spent several fortunes. The America's Cup might be set down by an appraiser as worth $500; yet Sir Thomas has spent at least $5,000,000 in its pursuit and is preparing to spend more.

Was it worth it? Well, that $5,000,000 did not buy a cent's worth of unhappiness. If good-will has a cash value, then Sir Thomas must have ten times $5,000,000 worth. Moreover, in a country that once threw the stuff overboard, the sale of tea has increased.

Sir Thomas is an unchanging figure, which may be one of the reasons for his popularity. The poor Irish boy of Glasgow—perhaps the one complexity in his career—established his success upon tea. Tea brought him knighthood, when he spent $75,000 during Queen Victoria's jubilee to buy tea for the poor of London. Tea means hospitality, and Sir Thomas has been a life-long personification of that quality. Tea is a habit, and a thirty-year habit of Sir Thomas has been challenging for the America's Cup. Therefore, Sir Thomas arrives this time with his American admirers in a dilemma. Some hope that he will celebrate his eightieth year by lifting the cup. Others hope that he will lose as a lesson in good sportsmanship. No winning of the cup could compare with the victories Sir Thomas has won as a graceful loser.

Waiting at Glamis.

FOR nearly a fortnight Glamis Castle—where the Macbeths murdered both sleep and MacDuff—has harbored a delicate, undersized man who is an omniverous reader. Around him the Scottish moors were explosive with grouse hunters, but the little man remained at Glamis, reading and waiting.

He waited because as Home Secretary of Great Britain it is his duty to be present at the birth of an heir to the throne. The Home Secretary was at Glamis when the first child of the Duke and Duchess of York, a girl, was born, and that official had to be there again in the event that the second child should be a boy, therefore superseding his sister in line for the British throne.

Hence the visit of John R. Clynes at Glamis—a visit that is as much of a tradition as searching the cellars of the Houses of Parliament on the eve of Guy Fawkes Day. Once there was suspicion of deception at a royal confinement—the details may be found in the pealing prose of Macaulay dealing with a certain incident in the reign of James II—and the presence of the Home Secretary (an appropriate office!) has been required ever since.

Forty years ago the man who waited at Glamis was a Lancashire mill hand. He lost one of his first jobs because his eyes were buried in an English grammar rather than fixed upon his loom; but that grammar opened many doors to him that the loom closed. The grammar gave him a use of words and the reading of everything he could lay his hands upon gave him a choice and command of words. Today Home Secretary Clynes as a speechmaker fills the benches of the House. The broad phrases of Lancashire are gone; in its place is diction which betrays no geography. The mill hand is now a Doctor of Civil Laws of Oxford and has been referred to as the "intellectual lamplighter of British labor."

A Man of Sorrows.

EMERGING victorious from the Republican primaries in Nebraska is Senator George W. Norris. His enemies wanted to hear less of him and to fulfill that ambition, such are the contradictions of politics, they brought forward another of his name, George W. Norris, a grocer of Broken Bow, as a candidate. But the candidacy of the Norris of Broken Bow became a broken reed weeks before the primaries; only a stalwart regular was left in the lists, and now a Senate investigating committee is on the way to Nebraska to learn more about the Broken Bow grocer.

If ever, Senator Norris should be entitled to wear a smile of triumph now; and yet such a smile would ill become him, for the countenance of the Senator from Nebraska is the face of a man of sorrows. He has a conscience, and he takes things very hard. He is one of the loneliest men in the Senate—lonely by choice, for he is suspicious of the compionship of the affluent and powerful.

Senator Norris is the hope of lost causes, the willing leader of forlorn hopes. In the Senate he takes a sombre joy in going down to defeat; in Nebraska his candidacies have succeeded with the regularity of well-oiled machines. He has dared to oppose measures favored by his State and in the end his constituents have rewarded him. Senators who keep their ears close to the ground look at Senator Norris and wonder, because term after term he has returned to Washington to go down with sinking ships. If they could explain the secret of his victories, then politics would be a science and not a mystery.

FLASHING strangers meteoric,
Dust of planets prehistoric,
Giddy flying bits of gravel,
From the road the comets travel,
Did you find it lonely there,
So far out from anywhere?

Is it better fun to race
Through the icy dark of space
Than it is to drop in here
In our nice warm atmosphere,
Where the stay-out star-fan prizes you—
Even if it oxidizes you?

Zip! a frantic streak of fire,
That's the end of you entire.
Still, to be a shining light
For one second of a night,
Is that sadder than to be
Cold through all eternity?

SKY-HIGH LUNCH CLUBS

SKY-LUNCHING has become a fashion that is growing with the multiplication of metropolitan towers. Sky-dining and sky-dancing have already made themselves one with the life of the city; but until recently the roof has been regarded generally as a haunt of the evening, having little to do with the city's daytime life, which has kept to the pavements below. For lunch time it has been customary to remain with one's feet on the earth. But no longer is this necessarily the case: even at noon the man of big business seems to prefer soaring by elevator above the din and dust of the workaday world. And his lunch club shows him the way.

The public restaurant remains on the ground or near it, where no risk is run of its presence being overlooked. But the private club prefers isolation and exclusiveness.

In the Financial District.

The financial district in particular has adopted the lunch club idea. No one today attains membership in the Stock Exchange without going in for a lunch club where he can refresh himself amid congenial surroundings, where he can take his friends with the feeling that he is doing something for them not every one could do and where he can arrange a luncheon conference with all the privacy he desires. Some of the clubs have a whole house of their own—like India House, staring at Hanover Square from a brownstone front that tells little of the memories of clipper ship days cherished inside; or Block Hall, with its diamond panes and timbered façade and its reminders of the old sea captain for which it is named.

The Bankers Club anticipated the current upward trend. Sky-lunching could hardly be said to have become a fashion when this organization moved into its thirty-eighth floor quarters in the Equitable Building. But the Bankers Club would not be the Bankers Club if one could not arise from the thronelike chairs of its dimly lit marble foyer, where sunshine vainly seeks admission around the edges of ponderous curtains, to lunch in a spacious hall reached by daylight from three sides and with a clear command of West Street traffic, moving like a flea circus far below, and a chance to tell the time from the clock by which Jersey City sets it watch.

When the Equitable Trust Company put up its new home looking down on the Morgan offices, the Broad Street Club spoke for its two top floors, a winding staircase binding the two into a unit. From their vantage point members may look through the small panes of great casement windows toward the Municipal Building, many blocks north; or gaze to the west on terms of familiarity, undreamed of by the man in the street, with the steel ribs of the Irving Trust Company's new building in the making.

High as the Broad Street Club is perched, the Rookery across the way looks down upon it from the superior vantage point of twenty-six more floors. The fifty-eighth floor of the new Bank of Manhattan tower is its home.

Uptown, lunch clubs spring not so thickly as on Manhattan's lower tip; yet it has remained for the middle of the island to provide the last height in sky-lunching. It is found just beneath the Chrysler Building's gleaming spire, on the sixty-sixth, sixty-seventh and sixty-eighth floors of the temporarily "tallest building in the world." This is the Clouds Club, called the most elaborate of the lunch clubs. It is hung so high that the domed ceiling of its luxurious modern dining room and the rafters of its old English tavern grill-room appear well above the clouds on a day when mist veils the city; and on a fine day the Clouds Club commands a view of all New York at one sweep of the eye.

Such a vogue for skyscraper lunch clubs has led to predictions that the pinnacle of every new skyscraper will be sought either by new lunch clubs or by some old one seeking to go still higher.

CAUSES OF OUR UNEMPLOYMENT: AN ECONOMIC PUZZLE

Several Factors Have Combined to Create an Industrial Problem That Is Little Understood—Remedies Await a Thorough Study of What Has Become a Complicated Subject for the Nation

STATISTICAL problems of unemployment in the United States are to be studied by a committee appointed recently by President Hoover, and methods of cooperation between government departments and business considered. Behind the facts of the number of unemployed lies the greater question of the causes of unemployment, still imperfectly understood. These causes are surveyed in the article below.

By W. M. KIPLINGER.

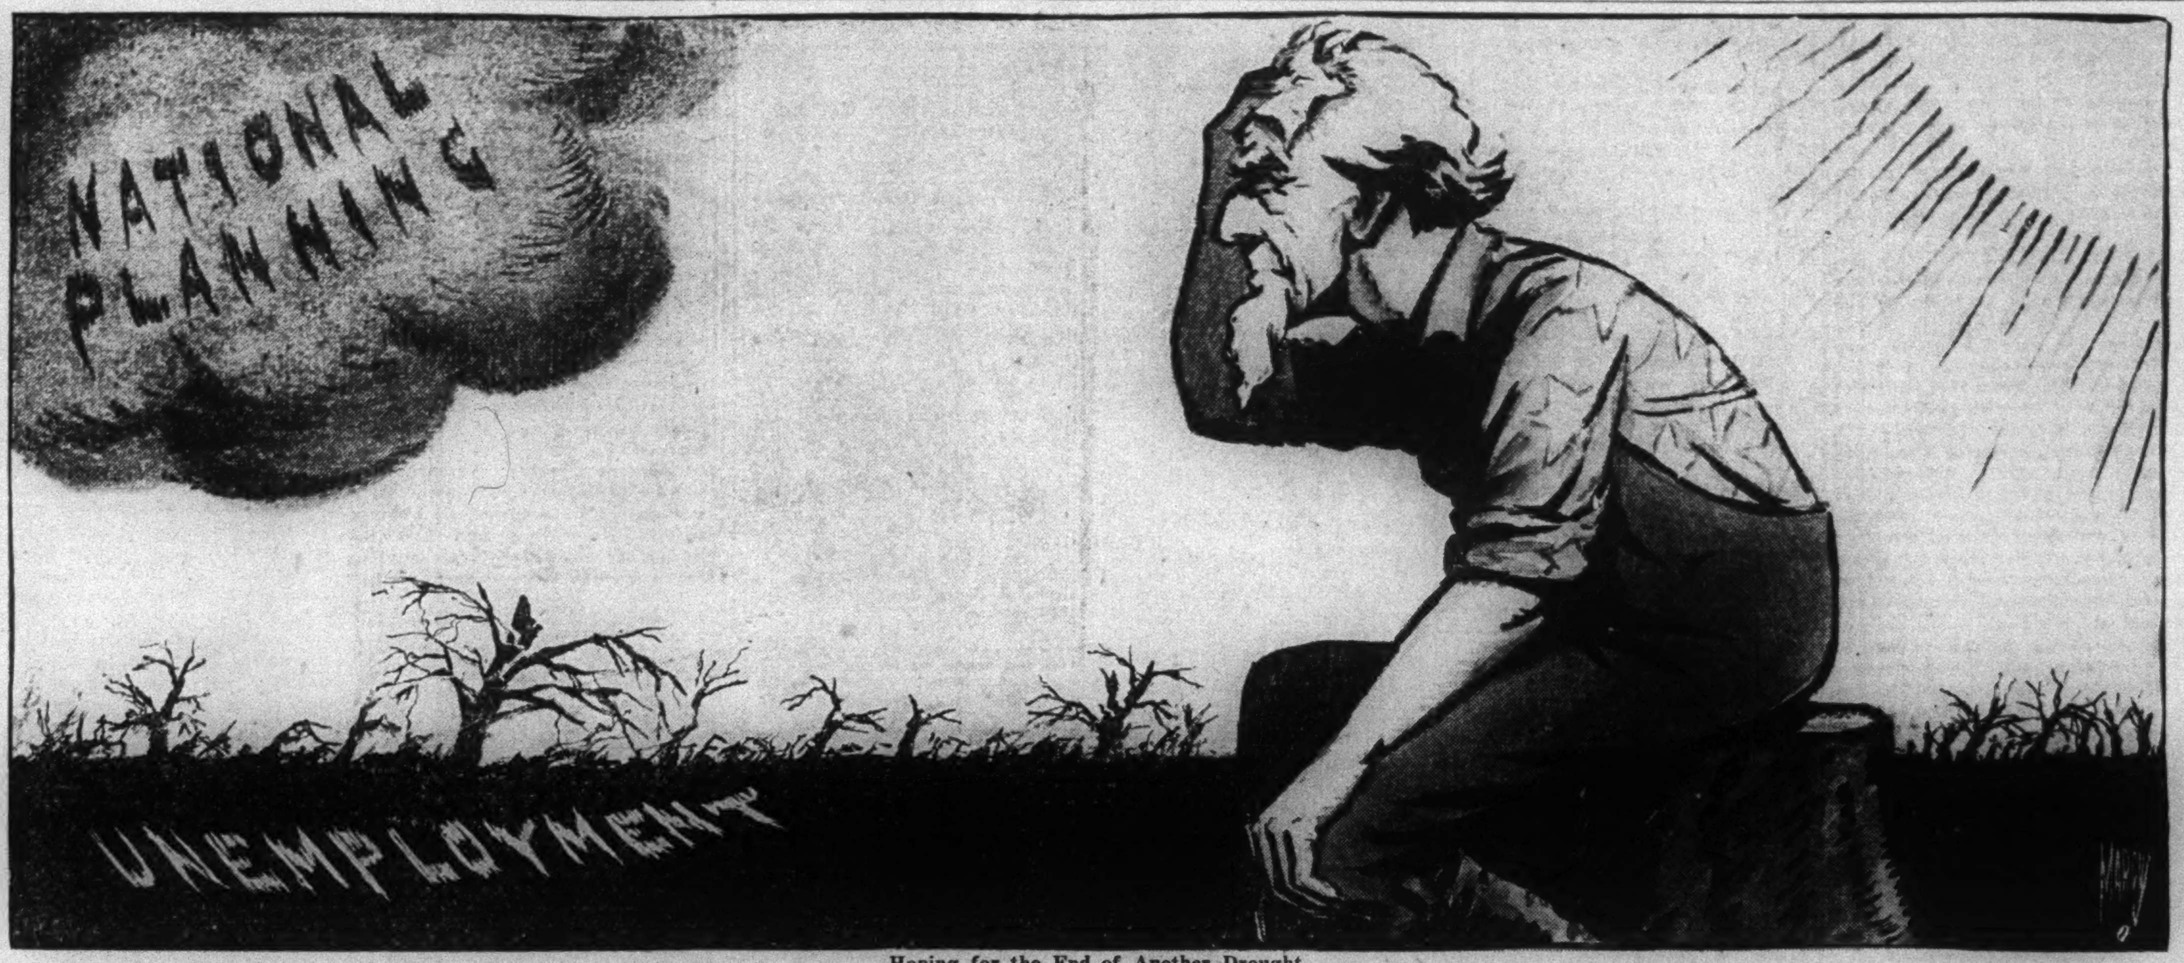
WASHINGTON.

NO waste is greater than unemployment; no suffering is keener or more fraught with despair than that due to inability by those who wish to work, to get jobs." So said Herbert Hoover, when he was Secretary of Commerce, in 1923, commenting on the report of the committee on business cycles and unemployment, which grew out of the business slump of 1921, when between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 men were unemployed. Today the country is in the worst business slump since then, nine years ago, and millions of men are going through the same keen suffering fraught with despair, due to the same old inability of those who wish to work to get jobs.

The facts of current unemployment, the controversial estimates of numbers of men out of work, are one thing. The causes are another thing; and attention must be directed to causes if remedies are to be found against repetition in future years of the unemployment griefs of this year.

Two points must be clearly understood. One is that the extent of unemployment is not definitely known. The other is that the underlying causes of economic maladjustments which rob men of jobs are imperfectly understood. Unemployment in a single community or in a single industry may be analyzed, but when the facts and the causes are ascertained they lead off into other communities and other industries, so that the problem of unemployment is national and all-inclusive. It is quite as complicated as the problem of business depression, for it is a segment of the same problem.



Hoping for the End of Another Drought.

Causes Never Fully Explored.

The causes of unemployment are loosely stated as follows:

1. The development of machines which do the work of many men under the direction of a few men; this is the technological aspect.
2. The overloading of industrial centres with men attracted or driven by circumstances from farms to cities.
3. The entrance of women into jobs formerly held by men.
4. Immigration, which is now less of a factor in unemployment than years ago.
5. Business depression, which is such a broad subject as to include both causes and effects of unemployment.

These are pretty theories, and there is a large element of truth in each of them, particularly the first, relating to the development of labor-saving machinery. The point needing emphasis is, however, that no one of them supplies the answer, nor even all five, for all have ramifications and all have never been studied or explored by qualified authorities. If unemployment is our greatest national economic evil, then the causes and remedies for our greatest national economic evil have had inadequate attention. We have picked at the subject piecemeal, instead of tackling it as a whole.

This discussion can do no more than suggest the causes of unemployment. It cannot prove precisely any cause.

Remedies Wait Upon Information.

Remedies for unemployment may have more timely interest than the causes, but remedies cannot be formulated intelligently without more knowledge of both facts and causes than are now available. Remedies generally advocated fall into two classes. One class consists of specifics or arbitrary panaceas, such as doles, or unemployment insurance, extravagant appropriations for public works after unemployment has developed, or fixed programs for maintaining payrolls. The other class is made up of more fundamental but less spectacular measures for maintaining business on an even keel, for developing an intelligent technique of economic balance, for educating business managements as to their community responsibilities in maintaining as steady employment as is possible, always working toward making it not only possible but of sound practical business expediency.

Artificial Panaceas.

The first class of artificial remedies leaps into prominence when the causes of unemployment are not understood and this is the situation at present. They are likely to be adopted in this country if we continue to shirk the task of searching to the bottom to ascertain why millions of men are periodically jobless.

It is estimated unofficially that 48,000,000 persons are gainfully employed in the United States. This means persons who have regular jobs of some sort and draw wages or salaries of some sort, and is exclusive of housewives and children. Of this number about 60 per cent are "wage earners," and 40 per cent are "proprietors" and "salaried employes."

Millions have been unemployed this year. Estimates are as low as 2,300,000 and as high as 6,600,000. Most estimates do not include agricultural workers. There is no reliable information on just how many have been out of work and there is no way of harmonizing the discrepancies between the various estimates, because the method in each case is different. It is certain only that a large number of persons are in fact out of work, have little or no current incomes, have dependents, have bills to pay for food, housing and clothing. It is certain that bills are incurred and not paid, that consequently "business is bad," and that the individual worries of the millions of unemployed are multiplied many times in terms of other millions who cannot escape dealings with the unemployed.

So-called "normal" unemployment is variously estimated at 1,000,000 to 3,300,000, and there is great controversy over the figures. This normal unemployment is vaguely regarded as a necessary evil, and an accompaniment of the unavoidable shiftings of population or working conditions. One purpose of studies of unemployment is to lead toward a lowering of the amount of normal unemployment, as well as to abolish abnormal unemployment.

Machinery and Man Power.

Among the causes of unemployment, consider first the substitution of machinery power for manual power. Consider it first not necessarily because it is most important, but because it is the most obvious. The installation of new machinery makes the employment of such large numbers of men unnecessary, and those not needed are discharged, become temporarily unemployed, but most of them eventually enter other occupations.

Technological Aspects Unsurveyed.

There is nothing new about technological causes of unemployment. They are as old as the industrial revolution. The fear of unemployment arose against the threshing machine, the sewing machine, the railroad, the power loom, the cotton gin, the linotype, the typewriter, the safety razor, the steam shovel; even the livery stable keeper was hard hit by the automobile. Now precisely the same fear arises in connection with the automatic telegraph instrument, the dial telephone, the bulky ditch-digging machine, the tremendous metal-stamping machine, the concrete mixer which lays and spreads the road as it goes, the bottle blowing machines, the various kinds of automatic office equipment, the automatic coal digging machinery, the reaper-thresher combine, the tractor and hundreds of others.

Men are always being replaced by machines, men are always looking for other jobs. The unemployment caused by machines is not cumulative, but is merely a transitory phase of the shift of employment. The problem of unemployment is not to stop the advance of machines, but to develop or perfect better human engineering schemes for aiding men to shift from one occupation to another, to keep ahead of the machines instead of being trampled under them.

It is often said that machines have become the masters of men, that mass production is the ruination of society, and it is customary to prove it by citing isolated figures of unemployment caused by machines. It would be quite as accurate to say that motorcars have ruined city life, and to prove it by citing statistics on the number of pedestrians run down. The fault lies not in the machine nor the machine system, but in the faulty adaptation of our social mechanism to the hard fact of machine development. We cannot stop the advance of machines; our problem is to adjust men to them.

Strange as it may seem, we know practically nothing about the technological aspects of unemployment. It has been observed, but not studied. It is easy to accumulate figures on how many men are rendered jobless by the introduction of advanced machine methods. It is easy to add up the figures, but the total means nothing for the reason that men deprived of one form of occupation turn to another. It is in the turning, the shifting, the transition, that the problem lies. Fragmentary studies have been made to show where men have turned in certain limited geographical areas, or occupational lines, when deprived of employment by the introduction of labor-saving devices. Farm hands have become machinists, machinists have become poultry raisers, coal miners have turned truck farmers, office clerks have become garagemen, telephone operators have become store clerks. The unemployed in Detroit have gone to Cleveland, the unemployed in Cleveland have gone to Pittsburgh, the unemployed in Pittsburgh have gone to Cleveland. Freight trains between San Francisco and Los Angeles carry the jobless in both directions.

Minimizing Effect of Machines.

The picture as a whole, however, has not been studied, and there is no adequate social machinery for directing men from one job to another job. Public and private employment agencies do their bit, but it is relatively a small bit, limited to the lower wage classes, limited by lack of information in all areas and all industries.

An example of one immediate remedy for minimizing the dislocation of employment by the installation of new machines is furnished by telephone companies. Two or three years before a telephone company in any community plans to establish automatic switchboards to replace women operators, the company makes a study of the record of each woman who might be let out. It determines for what the woman is adapted, where else she might be employed, what obligations of dependency she has upon her. The result has been a minimum of unemployment disturbance in most communities when the automatic switchboards were installed. Similar methods are used by some other large employers, but not by most.

Responsibility of Employers.

The remedy for the so-called technological unemployment probably lies in the gradual development of a sense of responsibility on the part of individual employers, the managements, and in the development of guiding principles for them. It is indisputable that managements today are far more cautious about hiring and firing workmen than they were even ten years ago. They neither expand nor contract their work forces with the same lackadaisical spirit which formerly prevailed. They show a gradually stronger inclination to hold their forces intact, to shift them rather than to let them out, to cut working hours and supply the entire force with less work and less aggregate wages, rather than to cut the wage scale. This is done not merely from public spirit, but for reasons of business expediency. From the standpoint of the community, it seems to be a move in the right direction, but it still is inadequate.

Women Not a Serious Factor.

Turning from technological causes of unemployment to the subject of women in business, it is apparent that women took men's jobs before and during the war, and that the tendency since the war has been in the opposite direction. A smaller proportion of women are employed in gainful occupations today than seven or eight years ago.

Here are the facts: In 1900 the number of employed women was 4,000,000. Between 1900 and 1910 occurred the greatest expansion in number of women workers, largely in industry, so that by 1910 the number was 8,075,000. During the war period, the number of employed women rose sharply, but this was due to unusual circumstances. By 1920, after the war, the total number of employed women was 8,549,000, representing a very small numerical increase above 1910, and a relative decrease considering the larger population. The increase occurred mainly in office and professional services, and to a lesser extent in factory workers and store clerks. There was a great decrease in the number of agricultural workers and in domestic employes.

Figures on employed women in 1930 are not yet available, but it is expected that there will be no large increase, and perhaps even a slight decrease from the 8,549,000 in 1920. Some of the work formerly done by women in factories and offices is now being done by automatic machines, such as packing machines and automatic office equipment.

Shortly after the war there arose a great hue and cry over the "stealing of men's jobs" by women. This has largely died down, partly due to the lack of increase of women workers and partly to a growth in recognition that women are entitled to jobs the same as are men. Furthermore, their earnings go, directly or indirectly, to support families, so that the total pool of unemployment is not seriously increased by the "intrusion" of women.

Shift From Farms Important.

It is the conclusion of those who have given most study to the subject that women workers do not represent an important element in the fundamental causes of unemployment. Women agricultural workers are employed for peak loads when sufficient numbers of men are not available; they do not crowd out men to any large extent. This may or may not be true of women factory workers. It is true of professional workers. Women domestic workers have the field largely to themselves. In office work, where the largest increase in the past two decades has occurred, women doubtless do work which could be performed by men, but there are so many exceptions, qualifications, and fine points of consideration that the fact becomes of small value in any balanced study.

Turn to immigration as a cause of unemployment. It adds slightly to the labor supply, but our immigration limitations in recent years have reduced the proportions to such an extent that it is considered not a major cause. In very few occupations nowadays does the complaint arise from native Americans that jobs are taken by immigrants.

Consider now the subject of shifts of population from farms to cities and towns. In this may probably be found the principal single cause of unemployment, though the influence is hard to trace mathematically.

Acutest Effect Is in Cities.

Unemployment is not strictly a city problem, but its most acute and socially gruesome aspects are seen in cities. Bread lines are in cities, not in the country districts. City occupations are more highly specialized. In cities more men stand upon one leg, from an occupational standpoint, whereas in the rural sections men stand upon five or six legs. To relieve unemployment in cities is always the more pressing need.

It would take infinite statistical calculations to determine the precise position of this farm-to-city movement of population in the unemployment picture, but most authorities agree that it is a major cause of industrial unemployment.

Business depression is the obvious cause of abnormal unemployment, such as the country now faces. But there is no easy way to tell where this begins as a cause or ends as an effect. Furthermore, the problems of business depression do not embrace the problems of unemployment, for even in "good times" the unemployed are with us. Unemployment, even in its less bad aspects, is caused by the shiftings which are part of human progress, and unemployment should be tackled from the angle of so-called normal times.

Need of a Broad, Deep Study.

In considering remedies for unemployment, the human tendency is to look for specifics and to think mainly of emergencies. People talk of expanding public works, such as roads and buildings, dams and flood controls. This is all right, but it is merely a very large drop in a big bucket, and there is a gap between the beginning of the suffering and the administration of relief. People talk loosely of governmental decrees to force employers to maintain their rolls. Some advocate doles or unemployment insurance, but Britain's experience makes it doubtful whether the merits of this are not outweighed by the demerits.

Shorter hours of labor, shorter working weeks, might tend to reduce unemployment, but they would not necessarily affect the normal unemployment. Doubtless the advocacy of old-age pensions will be stimulated by recognition that to draw off a certain amount of the labor of the aged from the labor markets has its economic advantages. Bread dispensaries and charity are, of course, a palliative. Employment agencies are good for a little alleviation. Local remedies within either single geographical or single industrial limits are often meritorious, but they are necessarily piecemeal.

What is needed is a broad and deep study of unemployment as a whole by some agency without predetermined pet ideas as to either causes or remedies. Diagnosis must come first, and current diagnosis of unemployment is woefully weak. If clouds have silver linings, then the lining of 1930's unemployment cloud may turn out to be a stimulation of public interest in the fundamental causes of a condition where men who need to work have no work to do. Unemployment is like yellow fever and smallpox, epidemics which for centuries were considered unavoidable until men learned they were avoidable. Some time within the next fifty years we shall learn to avoid unemployment, despite machines, population shifts, immigration and women in industry. The first step is the ascertainment of causes, and the first step is yet to be taken.

The main remedies ultimately may be found in balancing production and employment through better control by management and on a national scale of planning.

TARIFF CAMPAIGN IN BRITAIN HAS STARTED MANY CROSS-CURRENTS

By HAROLD CALLENDER.

LONDON.

WHILE M. Briand strives against disheartening odds to lay the foundations of a European federation which would enable the Continent to be more nearly an economic entity Great Britain turns with intensified interest to the possibility of developing a new kind of economic unity within her empire. She even considers imposing a tax upon her own food supply in order to bring it about.

If a united Europe were to become a reality instead of merely an alluring dream, it probably would surround itself with a heavy tariff wall, especially if America still adhered to her present habits in this regard. But within that enclosure would be a vast and diversified area of free trade. Similarly, if the imperial unity which lately has captivated the imagination of many Englishmen could be attained a tariff wall would be built around the whole British Empire, but within, the group of nations encompassed by its trade would be unencumbered by any such barriers. Thus both Europe and the empire, it is imagined, might achieve an economic unity comparable to that which America now enjoys.

It has seemed in the last few weeks as though Britain were so impressed by the practicability of this project as to be upon the point of abandoning completely her traditional policy of free trade and joining—reluctantly and in self-defense—in the high tariff race in which most of the other nations of the world have been engaged.

Tariff Movement Intensified.

Even some Liberals have weakened in their historic faith. For the first time speakers at a Liberal gathering have expressed doubts about free trade. This was at the Liberal Summer school at Oxford, the waiverers being E. D. Simon and C. G. Renold, both from Manchester, which is the home of the free-trade doctrine.

The resounding "crusade" for what Lord Beaverbrook, its most active sponsor, chooses to call "empire free-trade"—which really means empire protection—has gained ground steadily during the last year. To the drum-thumping campaign of Lord Beaverbrook have been added the carefully reasoned arguments of Lord Melchett, Sir Robert Horne and others. In spite of the justifiable misgivings of their leader, Stanley Baldwin, asking the country to accept food taxes, the Conservatives have raised the question in the House of Commons. A group of bankers—a class hitherto opposed to tariffs—have signed a manifesto to the effect that Great Britain must keep her markets open to empire products "while being prepared to impose duties on all imports from all other countries." Powerful newspapers have joined in the demand for a new tariff policy.

It is a bit early to assert, as some do, that the next general election will be fought out on the issue of an imperial tariff—which would enable labor to stand as champion of cheap food. But Lord Beaverbrook's agitation has stirred things up and brought support for his cause from unexpected quarters, and the movement for protection is still making headway.

Foreign Trade Declines.

It is a British movement rather than a colonial one, and the reason for its increasing appeal to the United Kingdom is very simple. To understand it one has only to glance at the figures for British foreign trade for the first half of this year. They show that imports have fallen 10.5 per cent and exports 16.2 per cent below the totals for the corresponding period of last year, and that Germany's exports forged ahead of Britain's.

Since she must import most of the food and raw materials she consumes, paying for them with exports, foreign trade is more vital to Britain than to any other great nation. Her foreign trade has languished for nearly a decade, however, and shows no signs of improving. All of the great manufacturing industries of the kingdom are depressed. The total of unemployed recently approached the 2,000,000 mark for the first time since 1922. Meanwhile, the burden of taxation, which heavily handicaps the British producer in competition with foreigners, has been increased.

Britain is desperately in need of markets for her manufactures. But wherever she turns in quest of markets—whether to foreign lands or to the British dominions—she faces an ominous barricade of tariffs which have tended in recent years to rise rather than to descend. Yet she herself imposes no duties at all upon most of the imports coming from these highly protected countries. In a world bristling with tariffs, free-trade Britain is declared to have scarcely a fair chance. Free trade, the argument runs, was a sound policy when Great Britain was the leading manufacturing nation and needed raw materials from all the world, but today nearly every nation—even small ones that never thought of doing so before the war—seeks to be its own manufacturer.

The Old Free Trade Traditions and New Policies of Dominions Are Entangled

Most important of all is the rivalry of the United States, now the greatest of manufacturing nations. It is felt not only in foreign markets but within the British Empire. Sir Robert Horne recently referred to this "menace."

"Already even in these friendly regions [the dominions]," he said, "we are being injuriously affected by the menacing rivalry of the United States, who have been making gains there, as in other parts of the world, at our expense. The portent of America, with half the gold of the world and five times our annual income, has set the statesmen of the Continent of Europe thinking. Small wonder that the idea of a United States of Europe has emerged and is taking shape as an equipoise to the formidable economic power on the other side of the Atlantic."

Many advocates of European union—though not M. Briand—have envisaged it as a necessary counterpart to the United States, whose economic advance, and especially the newly enacted tariff, have been regarded as endangering the welfare of Europe. The ideal of an economically united and tariff-protected British Empire likewise has gained momentum from the expansion of American foreign trade at the expense of British.

How the Plan Might Work.

But how, it will be asked, can Great Britain increase her exports by putting a tariff upon imports? The answer—as the protectionists see it—is that a tariff on foreign imports into Great Britain would enlarge the market for dominion and colonial produce in Great Britain; and in return for this favor the dominions would lower, and eventually remove entirely, their duties upon British goods. The program so vehemently urged upon the Conservative party has not been very precisely defined by any of its protagonists, but basically it looks to free trade within the empire and protection against the outside world. Britain would buy Canadian and Australian wheat instead of American and Argentinian wheat, and Canada and Australia, it is assumed, would buy steel from Sheffield instead of from Pittsburgh.

Thus the project contemplates both a raising and a lowering of tariffs—raising of British duties on foreign goods and lowering of dominion duties on British products. So far as Britain is concerned, if it would help the manufacturer, it would penalize the consumer; while in the dominions the producer of raw materials would stand to gain and the manufacturer to suffer by being exposed to British competition.

While the protectionist campaign derives its immediate stimulus from the trade depression and unemployment, it also takes to itself a sort of imperial patriotism and somewhat implies that he who does not favor tariffs is not really a supporter of empire development. The appeal of the empire and its economic possibilities is a potent one. The economic wealth of the British Empire, embracing territories in all the latitudes from the Antipodes to the Arctic, is imposing.

The empire contains about 437,000,000 inhabitants, and its trade comprises about 29 per cent of all the trade of the world. It produces 45 per cent of the world's wool, 36 per cent of the sheep, 68 per cent of the gold, 23 per cent of the wheat, 39 per cent of the cattle, 52 per cent of the rice, nearly half the cocoa, 29 per cent of the jute, 59 per cent of the rubber, 16 per cent of the silver, 82 per cent of the diamonds, 17 per cent of the coal, nearly half the tin, 88 per cent of the nickel, 90 per cent of the asbestos, 9 per cent of the iron ore, 7 per cent of the copper ore, but only 1.5 per cent of the petroleum. Its shipping is a third of the world's total. Yet much of its area is still in the undeveloped state in which America was a century ago.

Not Self-Sustaining.

Vast as are the resources of this great league of British nations—as it is sometimes called—and various as are its raw materials, it is not self-sufficing. It is a group of economic units whose interests by no means coincide and among which there is some active competition, as exemplified in the Dominion tariff systems. Its economic interests are international as well as interimperial.

As a market for the products of the United Kingdom, the empire bulks large, and for some British industries it exceeds the entire foreign market in importance. The empire takes more than half the British exports of iron and steel, pottery and glass, cutlery and hardware; 60 per cent of the British exports of electrical goods, 72 per cent of the wearing apparel, 74 per cent of the paper and cardboard and over half the wood manufactures. Forty-four per cent of the United Kingdom's imports of grain and flour, 24 per cent of its imports of meats, 81 per cent of its imported wool, 51 per cent of its other textiles, half its imported hides and skins and 78 per cent of its rubber are obtained from the overseas empire.

Still, more than half the total exports of the United Kingdom (52 per cent approximately) are sold in non-empire countries, and about 72 per cent of its imports come from such foreign lands. As for the overseas empire—that is, all the dominions and colonies—nearly 54 per cent of its exports now find a market in foreign lands, 36 per cent are sold in the United Kingdom and the remaining 10 per cent represent interchange between other parts of the empire. Of the overseas empire's imports nearly 50 per cent come from foreign countries, 37 per cent from the United Kingdom and 13 per cent from the rest of the empire.

Dominions Seek Protection.

Thus the United Kingdom does a good deal more trading—and the overseas empire slightly more—with countries outside the empire than with countries within the empire. And in the last two years—1927 to 1929—British exports to foreign countries showed an increase of about $113,000,000, while British exports to the empire dropped $10,000,000. According to figures published by Lord Melchett, of the aggregate trade of the British Empire—which amounted to about $19,000,000,000 in 1927—73.7 per cent represented trade with foreign countries and only 26.3 per cent was trade within the empire.

The United Kingdom can no more consume all the raw materials the empire has to sell than the empire can take the United Kingdom's total output of manufactured articles. Nor can the United Kingdom get from the empire all the raw materials it needs, notably in the cases of petroleum and cotton. Both must depend upon foreign markets and foreign sources of supply.

Moreover, the dominions have limited their consumption of United Kingdom products by going in for protection on their own account. While they grant preferential tariff rates to some British commodities, they do not do so when those commodities compete with their own. Canada, Newfoundland, Australia,

MEDICINE, LISTING ITS TRIUMPHS, HAS NEW WORLDS TO CONQUER

The Individual, With His Chance for Health Vastly Increased in a Generation, Must Share in This Major Campaign

RECENTLY the American Medical Association and the National Educational Association jointly made the striking statement that the nation's death rate had been cut in half and that in the case of many diseases, such as diphtheria, it has been reduced 95 per cent. The following article, tracing the history and the remaining problems of efforts to improve health has, therefore, special pertinence. The article is written by the Professor of Public Health Administration, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University.

By DR. HAVEN EMERSON.

A NEW YORKER born fifty years ago was indeed lucky if he survived his first year, for one out of every four babies born alive at that time died without even a one-candle birthday party. Today only one out of seventeen dies as a sacrifice to ignorance, neglect, dirt and the misfortunes of his inheritance. That little fellow of fifty years ago could look forward to but about forty years of life if he survived the risks of his first year, while his grandchild today can count on fifty-eight to sixty years.

In the Middle Ages in Europe or, to be more exact, about the end of the Hundred Years' War, the average length of life was probably not more than eighteen years. When Napoleon was finally disposed of, about 115 years ago, the span of life had risen to about thirty-three years. In Lincoln's time in this country forty years was the average length of life, and now in New Zealand an average life duration of over sixty-four years has been attained. What is still more to the point, we know now a great many facts which, if they were used, would put us within reach of the biblical seventy-year span.

Something to Strive For.

Looking about us at our neighbor States and cities, we find groups of people at the various ages who have been so blessed by good education, fortunate types of employment and excellent health and sickness care that they have actually escaped preventable diseases and deaths to such a degree that if we were all as well guided and guarded, the average expectancy of life in the United States would be now between sixty-eight and sixty-nine years.

Yes, we see examples of very favored and again hardly tolerable conditions even among our greater cities, with life expectancy in Washington, D. C., from five to ten years higher than it is in Pittsburgh for babies a year old.

To have added 50 per cent to the average length of human life between Lincoln's time and Hoover's is cause for wonder, for enthusiasm, for study to do better, to secure for all what is now often denied to the poor and ignorant.

And how has it come about? And what have been the particular burdens we have shaken off the shoulders of mankind?

Apparently there have been three great phases in the public health history of our time. Beginning with 1848, when the sanitary era seized the imaginations of the statesmen and government of Great Britain, the ideas of such leaders as Edwin Chadwick, John Simon and Farr, the statistician, slowly penetrated the struggling States on this side of the water. Lemuel Shattuck of Boston and Stephen Smith of New York were already rousing public interest in the fact that people were each year dying in our large cities faster than they were replaced by births.

Cleaning the Cities.

Actually in the days of our grandfathers, whether among Puritans or Knickerbockers or Quakers, the death-rates of the cities often exceeded the birth-rate. Thirty and more out of every 1,000 inhabitants died each year and not more than twenty-eight were born. Today we have birth-rates of about twenty and death-rates of eleven to twelve per 1,000 per annum.

Once the people were aroused to the reasons why cities had become destroyers instead of protectors of human life, action followed swiftly, and there is no more inspiring story in metropolitan history than that of the Citizens' Sanitary Commission which made the famous and still unexcelled survey of every house and block of each sickness and death in New York City in the year 1865. The Legislature created the Metropolitan Board of Health and gave it police power in matters concerning all causes of sickness and death, whether or not known to be preventable.

The physical surroundings of human life were first attacked. People were heaved out of cellar dwellings, extreme overcrowding of lodging houses was stopped, sewers were constructed, pure water was introduced, unwholesome milk produced by diseased cattle fed on brewery wastes was forbidden, and the plague spots of the city were condemned in the public interest. From 1870 until 1900 there was a new era of sanitary conscience, in which the foundation for housing reform was laid, nuisances abated, disease-carrying vermin reduced and the health officer and his inspectors played more the rôle of policemen than of scientists or teachers. Under authority of the law, cleanliness saved lives, and quarantine and isolation checked epidemics.

Children were the first to benefit, as they had always been the heaviest sufferers from filth. Of all the preventable causes of death, the so-called Summer diarrheas of infancy and the dysenteries of old and young showed the earliest and most significant drop. Often one-third of all the deaths in a year were from diarrhea and enteritis among children under 5 years of age. Even today this is the case throughout Greece and in many a land of the Near and Far East.

Cleanliness Stressed.

With the diseases due to human filth went smallpox, typhus and yellow fever out of our seaport cities. The blessing of Jenner's vaccination, the higher standards of plain soap-and-water cleanliness and the discovery of the rôle of the mosquito combined to rid us of these devastating epidemics. Similarly, cholera and plague disappeared and typhoid fever began to wane with the introduction of sanitary water supplies.

In 1900 began the second public health era, an entirely new phase evolved out of our knowledge of the three simple facts about tuberculosis. Year in and year out and throughout the world in the nineteenth century, tuberculosis headed the list of causes of death, but by 1900 such medical leaders as Biggs Trudeau, Prudden and Janeway were ready to declare that tuberculosis was curable, communicable and preventable. These men insisted that no mere exercise of sanitary law could eradicate a disease so involved in its origin and so deeply spread in the fabric of our personal, social and home life. With a tuberculosis death-rate up to 300 per 100,000 population per annum and, as we now know, probably ten infected persons with recognizable evidence of this infection for each death in the year, the problem of control, prevention and curative treatment became a crucial one. Widespread popular instruction was selected as the most promising power at our disposal.

An Educational Era.

It was this emphasis upon the necessity of general public information about the disease that led to the second or educational era of public health as distinguished from the authoritarian or sanitary era which preceded it. Following the example of the triumphant tuberculosis campaign there came great waves of educational effort directed against the social diseases, against mental disease, against avoidable cancer, heart disease, blindness, deafness and, most appealing of all, against the untimely deaths of mothers and babies.

So bombarded have we been with the appeals of health crusaders that we have hardly taken time to count our gains, test our techniques and methods and look about for new fields to conquer. It is well, then, to sum up our knowledge and achievement, so ably set forth in the recently issued joint report prepared by the physicians and school teachers of the nation and to start with new ambitions from our higher level of safety, strength and wisdom.

It can be said that, beginning with the early months of pregnancy, the expectant mother may now achieve health for herself and the child-to-be through prenatal supervision by physician and nurse. The infant, the runabout child, the school child, each at suitable times is taught to retain its initial health fund, and add to it by the medical guidance given to parents and teachers in its interest. The youth, the husband and wife, and the grandparents in their turn learn by regular contact with their health adviser how to avoid unnecessary errors of diet, exercise, rest, play and work as their bodies and spirits adjust to the ceaseless change demanded by the passing years.

These are the lessons of preventive medicine for this generation: A good standard of physical environment, sanitation in home, in city, in shop, for foods, water and waste disposals—all results of the initial public health movement. A good general understanding of the causes and means of prevention of disease, particularly those which are communicable, arose out of the second era of public health in the last thirty years.

We have triumphed over many varieties of death. Our children are surer to live, to fill out a more generous span of life, to live more vigorous lives less hampered by disease and defects. They can be guaranteed absolute immunity against smallpox, and yet there are 50,000 cases in a year in the United States among those who care not to protect themselves or their fellows. Since 1916 we have known how to prevent diphtheria, and yet we have an army of cases and deaths each year—fewer, it is true, but too many to let us pause with satisfaction.

New Enemies for Old.

Tuberculosis, typhoid fever and many other preventable and communicable diseases have shrunk to a fraction of their ancient peril. And still we see the young snatched from our midst by no less certain causes of death, and by causes no less preventable. Look at the list of leading causes of death fifty years ago and now as given in the following table, the figures being per 100,000 of population:

	Manhattan and Bronx, 1873-75.	Greater New York, 1923-25.	P.C. Change.
Scarlet fever	80	1	−99
Diphtheria and croup	235	11	−95
Diar'hea under 5 yrs.	335	22	−93
Diseases of the nervous system	252	39	−85
Pulmonary tuberculosis	404	84	−79
All other causes not listed	874	316	−64
Acute respiratory diseases	352	164	−53
All causes	2,890	1,220	−42
Bright's disease and nephritis	100	69	−31
V'olence	120	85	−27
Cancer	41	113	+176
Heart disease	89	255	+187
Diseases of arteries.	8	61	+663
Diabetes	2	25	+1,150

Is it merely a replacement of old enemies by new, strange brutalities crowding out familiar ones?

Yes; if we would carry on the successes of our parents, we must adapt our methods of attack to the strategy of our twentieth century opponents.

The infections still to be controlled are chiefly tuberculosis, syphilis, gonorrhea, malaria, and with these the parasitic infestation of hookworm. Influenza remains an unbeaten enemy, and the common cold and the pneumonias are ever-present plagues. Of another and dramatically threatening nature among unsolved communicable diseases are infantile paralysis (poliomyelitis) and sleepy sickness (epidemic encephalitis).

The Progress Made.

But against all of these we have some experience, technique, self-confidence; while our ignorance in some respects is vast, we can confidently plan for success in a large way against communicable infections and infestations.

We face, however, the rapidly increasing array of occupational or industrial diseases, and the accumulating disorders of nutrition, those caused by overindulgence in good foods as well as those following a partial starvation or deficit in some particular quality or article of nutriment. We have the slowly growing mass of cancer deaths, the mounting toll of loss from heart diseases, the steadily increasing population of our hospitals for mental ailments, all to some degree representing preventable errors.

The very listing of the leading causes of death today discloses the weaknesses of our past campaigns, unless we take a further forward step and enroll unanimously for the third—and what should be the final, or, at least, the most enduring—era of preventive medicine. We are, as it were, at the very threshold of the greatest successes of all times, holding within our sight and grasp a degree of freedom from ill health that is capable of routing most of the world's bodily suffering and misery. Not alone by the use of authority through our constituted health officers and departments, nor yet by the unaided influence of widespread understanding of the simple essentials of hygiene are the battles of today and to morrow to be won, as were those of the past fifty years.

Only by universal personal participation shall we win a greater length of life for our children. And by this we mean the individual use of medical skill for prevention, as in the past we have looked to the doctor to relieve us of the suffering of sickness and to some degree postpone and make bearable our final illnesses.

No one can be compelled to live healthily by a sanitary ordinance. General knowledge of vitamins and calories will not assure a well-developed body, nor will familiarity with the terms of the psychoanalyst secure a well-balanced mind, good conduct or rational emotions.

Only by the systematic use of the periodic health examination can we bring the right way of living healthily, with accuracy, force, and appropriateness, into the life of each member of the household, factory, or general community.

No one can understand the relative importance of slight deviations from good health so well as your trusted family physician. He has seen you in the midst of illnesses, severe, imaginary or transient, has seen your capacity to recover, knows your individual hazards of work, worry and pleasure, and can estimate your capacity for self-control, judgment and endurance.

The competent general practitioner of medicine is the original health officer, the family and home the first and best health centre unit. The creation of universal health in the future is primarily a problem for the individual to accomplish with the advice of his personal physician. Public health is but the sum of personal health.

Where Rain Has Sculptured the Earth in a Dry Climate: The Big Bad Lands of South Dakota.

RAINFALL THE MOST UNCERTAIN OF ERRATIC WEATHER ELEMENTS

Vagaries of Air Streams of the Globe Have Robbed a Part of the Continent of Its Usual Amount of Moisture This Summer

By C. F. TALMAN.

WHILE the American Corn Belt scorched in this Summer's drought, Japan and the China coast were drenched with torrential rains. While streams of the Mississippi River system touched unprecedentedly low stages for the season, the River Indus, in India, rolled its swollen waters over towns and villages. At a moment when drinking water was a salable commodity in many districts of the United States, one of the worst cloudburst floods of recent years destroyed lives and property in Southern Arizona. Such are the vicissitudes of rainfall, the most capricious and erratic of all weather elements.

Taken as a whole, our earth is a well-watered planet. Rain and snow fall upon its surface at an average rate of something like 16,000,000 tons a second. If this tremendous shower bath were evenly distributed in space and time, every spot on the globe would be continually supplied with ample water for all human requirements.

Of the actual diversity of its distribution you get a mere inkling from an ordinary rainfall chart of the globe. Such a chart shows how the mean annual rainfall varies from region to region; from the huge subtropical and polar deserts to the humid coasts and mountain slopes exposed to moist winds from the ocean. It gives no indication of the marked seasonal contrasts of rainfall that are found in some parts of the world, nor does it furnish a hint of the great fluctuations that occur everywhere from year to year.

The chart will show, for example, an average annual rainfall of ten to twenty inches over the southern coastal region of California, but you must go to other sources to learn that the average rainfall of the three Summer months in the same region is only a small fraction of an inch. It will show, again, that the northeastern corner of Brazil receives yearly, on an average, plenty of rain for agricultural needs, but it will fail to show that in some years the crops in this area are damaged by excessive moisture, while in others the shortage of rainfall is so disastrous that the region has become famous throughout the world for its terrible droughts.

Normal Weather the Exception.

With the aid of daily observations made at thousands of weather stations during long periods of years, meteorologists have compiled climatic "normals" for nearly all the inhabited portions of the earth. These figures, which represent average conditions, serve a variety of purposes, both scientific and practical, but they are often utterly misleading as indications of what will happen at a particular time and place. It is a paradoxical fact, more familiar to the meteorologist than to the public at large, that normal weather is exceptional. Thus, the average temperature—the so-called "normal"—for the month of January at Chicago, as deduced from records covering a period of eighty-three years, is 24 degrees, yet during the eighty-three years in question there were only two in which Chicago actually had a mean temperature of 24 degrees in January.

What is true of temperature, at Chicago and elsewhere, is much more conspicuously true of rainfall. Nature laughs at "normals" in distributing this element of weather, and the farmer whose undertakings are admirably planned on the basis of rainfall statistics often comes to grief because the actual rains are not according to program.

The most striking cases of erratic rainfall are those observed in the arid and semi-arid regions of the temperate and torrid zones, where habitual dryness is occasionally varied by local downpours of excessive intensity. The records of Yuma, Ariz., furnish some examples. The normal annual rainfall here, as computed from many years of observations, is 3.3 inches, but the rainfall of 1899 was 0.6 inch, that of 1905 was 11.4 inches, and at the close of September, 1921, Yuma was deluged with 3.65 inches of rain—more than the total for an average year—within the short space of twenty-four hours.

The "Dampest Corner."

Quite as remarkable as the variations of rainfall from time to time are those that occur from place to place, even within small areas. Cases of such diversity are common all over the Hawaiian Islands, where they are due to differences of altitude and of exposure to the prevailing winds. Within the single city of Honolulu there are places where the annual rainfall averages less than thirty inches and there are others where it averages more than 100 inches. In the island of Kauai a distance of only fifteen miles separates a place where the average annual rainfall is fifteen inches from the summit of Mount Waialeale—known to fame as "Uncle Sam's dampest corner"—where the average, though not yet satisfactorily determined, certainly far exceeds 400 inches a year.

In the island of Maui, according to O. E. Meinzer of the United States Geological Survey, there are two places seven miles apart, one having an average annual rainfall of 400 inches and the other of eight inches. Writing of the island of Hawaii, Mr. Meinzer says: "When we were engaged in field work in the Kau district we could virtually choose each morning, on starting out from Pahala, whether to go 'mauka' (mountainward), where we would be working in mist, rain and dripping vegetation, or to go 'makai' (seaward), where the day would be as bright and the land as dry as if we were in the desert of Arizona."

The local variations of rainfall that sometimes occur in individual showers are familiar to everybody. Thus it is not an uncommon experience to see rain falling briskly on one side of a city street while the opposite side remains dry.

Freqency of Showers.

In order to investigate variations of this sort, a Russian meteorologist, T. J. Kassatrin, has for some years been collecting the results of rainfall observations made at brief intervals of time at a large network of stations in the city of Moscow. Thus in the Summer of 1921 there were seventy-eight stations in different parts of the city at which, on certain rainy days, the occurrence or nonoccurrence of rain was noted at intervals as brief as five or ten minutes. The results of the observations were plotted on a series of charts.

While in certain types of rainfall the shower prevailed simultaneously at all stations, there were other cases in which the rainfall was remarkably "spotty." On several occasions the rain areas shown on the charts have roughly the shape of a horseshoe, and there is a tendency for areas of this kind to retain their identity through a series of maps, though changing in outline and location. Such a rain area tends to travel along the axis of the horseshoe, but not usually in the direction of the wind. The movement may be at right angles to the wind, or even directly opposed to it.

Measures of Rain.

Because of the striking local variations to which rainfall is subject, it is quite impracticable to provide in any region enough rain-gauges to furnish an accurate idea of the amount of rain falling over the region during a single shower or during any relatively short period up to a year or more. Thus in the United States, according to Professor A. J. Henry, we should need at least one rain-gauge for every quarter section of land (160 acres) to give correct figures for the rainfall of a single year, whereas we have actually an average of only one gauge for each 595 square miles. The closest network of rainfall stations in the world, that maintained in the island of Barbados, has only about 200 stations for an area of 166 square miles.

Hence, in all parts of the world where rainfall is measured there is much uncertainty about the amount that falls over any considerable area on a particular day or during a particular month or year. On the other hand, in the course of many years a few gauges, suitably exposed, probably give us fairly accurate average values for any region where the rainfall is not greatly complicated by topography. Rainfall is, in general, so much influenced by altitude and slope that there is usually a large element of guesswork in the figures relating to the rainfall of a mountainous region.

How much water falls in the rainiest parts of the world? How much falls in the driest? So far as annual averages go, the answers to these questions are that we do not know of any place where the average reaches 500 inches, nor do we know of any where rain never falls, though some places get only a small fraction of an inch in the average year.

The phenomenal rainfall of Cherra Punji, a village in the Khasi Hills of Assam, has long been world-renowned. Cherra Punji gets most of its rain from the southwest monsoon. The place occupies a small level tract 4,455 feet above sea level, at the head of a steep-walled valley. The Bengal branch of the monsoon blows into this valley and is deflected abruptly upward, condensing its moisture on account of the cooling due to expansion, the station being at the altitude of maximum condensation from this cause. This wind is moisture-laden, not only on account of blowing from the Bay of Bengal, 200 miles away, but also because the intervening tract of low land over which it passes to reach the mountains is mostly inundated by river floods during the monsoon season, forming a vast lake.

Record Rainfalls.

This combination of circumstances gives the place an enormous rainfall, confined mainly to the Summer half of the year, though the figure accepted at present for the annual average is decidedly lower than those quoted in former years. The latest average for the official weather station, based on a forty-nine-year record, is 428 inches. The official gauge, however, is probably not at the wettest place in the village, and other gauges in the neighborhood give higher averages, up to 450 inches. Another mountain station, Manoyuram, not far from Cherra Punji, registered an average of 499 inches a year, but the station was in operation only five years, which is too short a time to furnish a trustworthy normal.

The huge rain-gauge at the summit of Mount Waialeale, in the Hawaiian Islands, designed to hold an entire year's rainfall and only visited at rare intervals, has yielded some startling figures. Between visits made on May 21, 1915, and May 31, 1916, the gauge was found to have caught 561 inches of rain, but this amount was probably exceptional. The latest tentative figure published for the average annual rainfall at this place is 427 inches, which would make it the rainiest known spot under the American flag, but not the rainiest in the world.

The Record in Oregon.

The rainiest known place in the continental United States, exclusive of Alaska, is Glenora, in Tillamook County, Ore., with an average yearly rainfall of 131.5 inches. The station is located 575 feet above sea level, close to the coast, in a deep ravine running east and west, where it gets the full rain-making effect of the prevailing winds from the Pacific. At the opposite extreme, so far as existing records go, we have the weather station at Greenland Ranch, on the eastern border of Death Valley, Cal., with an average annual rainfall of only 1.65 inches, the lightest known in the United States.

The greatest rainfall for a period of twenty-four hours thus far measured anywhere in the world was 46 inches, which fell at Baguio, in the Philippines, from noon, July 14, to noon, July 15, 1911. Cherra Punji registered 41 inches in twenty-four hours in June, 1876. The greatest twenty-four-hour fall recorded in the United States proper was 23.11 inches at Taylor, Texas, on Sept. 9-10, 1911.

A protracted drought in a region where the rains are normally ample is just one more episode in this endlessly varied drama of rainfall eccentricities. It implies no depletion of the earth's total water supply. It means merely that—for reasons that science still seeks in vain—the main air streams of the globe shift at times from their habitual courses, diminishing the frequency and intensity of cyclonic storms in one region, increasing their frequency and intensity in another. It is probably the rule—as has happened this Summer—that too little rain in one part of the world is offset by too much somewhere else.

VIKING RELICS FOUND AT VISBY BEAR WITNESS TO TERRIBLE BATTLE

RELICS of the Vikings, some nearly 600 years old, have been brought to light in excavations conducted by the Swedish Government just outside the walls of Visby, ancient capital of Gottland. The relics generally are bits of bone and mail and armor—all that is left of 1,800 strong men of Visby who died fighting off the attack of the Danish King, Valdemar Atterday, on July 17, 1361.

New knowledge about that desperate battle is revealed by the presence of death-dealing darts stuck fast in skulls. The bones of women and children and the crippled who left their homes to assist the fighting men have also been found.

The dead were buried in a common grave where they fell. The excavators discovered a cross of stone, engraved with the image of Christ and a Latin inscription, which reads: "In the year of Our Lord, 1361, on the third day after St. James's fell the Gottlanders before the gates of Visby at the hands of the Danes. Here they lie interred. Pray for them."

Known as the city of ruins and roses, Visby recently celebrated what it contended was its 700th anniversary. Geologists, however, believe the city to be much older and have traced its history back to the Stone Age, when the Baltic is believed to have been a fresh water lake. Such prehistoric weapons of the Stone Age inhabitants of Gottland as scrapers, celts and saws of flint, have been found by excavators. From the skeletons ample evidence has been obtained that many of the medical ills afflicting mankind today were enemies of the Vikings.

NEW LIGHT SHINES ON THE EEL, NOMAD OF RIVERS AND OCEANS

Snakelike Fish Travel Far to Breeding Places Near Bermuda, and Larvae Make the Trip Back

THE eel, long a mystery of the sea, has given up its secrets to a group of Danish scientists who have just returned from an oceanographic expedition around the world in the royal research ship Dana. The expedition's members followed the eel to its breeding places and thus pieced out its life history. Their findings in the Indian Ocean practically complete the strange story of the eel's life, which Dr. Johannes Schmidt, leader of the expedition, first outlined after his investigations in the Atlantic between 1920 and 1922.

Eels spend part of their adult years in the lakes, streams and harbors leading into the Atlantic and Indian Oceans. Fishing for them in these streams and lakes provides a livelihood for many, since the eels are widely used as food. In spite of this fact the eel's life history and habits had remained unknown, however, until Dr. Schmidt discovered that each season some of them swim down to the sea. Those found in Western Europe and along the Mediterranean travel hundreds of miles across the Atlantic to the Sargasso Sea, near Bermuda, where they breed. It is said that they die soon after, or at least disappear.

Their larvae grow slowly, spreading at the same time across the Atlantic and reaching the European or Mediterranean coasts during Summer of the third year. By this time they are full grown and the familiar metamorphosis from larva to adult occurs. They change into elvers, or little eels, and swim up the rivers and streams down which their parents swam about three years before. Most of them reach maturity between four and nine years later, when they in turn begin the long trip to their breeding place in the Sargasso Sea. It is at this time, when as full grown adults they are swimming down the rivers and streams to the oceans, that the fishermen seek to intercept them.

The eels which live in the rivers and harbors of the North American coast breed in an area of the Sargasso Sea still further westward from that in which the European eels usually spawn. Their larvae mature in one year instead of about three. As a result those that happen to swim eastward reach the European coast as grown eels, while European larvae which swim westward reach the American coast before any metamorphosis occurs. The most recent investigations made by Dr. Schmidt and his party have shown that the eels found in the rivers of East Africa, India, the Dutch East Indies and Australia have similar breeding places in the Indian Ocean and similar life histories.

The information gained by this scientific investigation is said to settle the question of possible exhaustion of the supply. It had been suggested that catching the eels before they had spawned would reduce their numbers so greatly as to make fishing on a large scale impractical. These researches show that no matter how many are caught at any particular fishery enough will reach the breeding place from other sources to keep up their numbers.

TRAIT OF "PERSEVERATION" STUDIED FOR BEARING ON HUMAN CONDUCT

THE results of studies in "perseveration," a trait in human nature that has been very little explored by psychology so far, were announced recently by Dr. Hazel M. Cushing of Columbia University.

Perseveration is the tendency of a child, or an adult, for that matter, to continue an activity when there is no purpose in view. A boy interminably transferring marbles from one box to another with such absorbing interest that he refuses to eat his dinner and an adult who hums the same tune to himself over and over are both typical examples of the trait.

Experiments with seventy children between 2 and 5 years have led Dr. Cushing to conclude that an individual has a certain amount of this trait as an inborn characteristic, and he continues to display that degree of perseveration throughout life. Boys are slightly more inclined to it than girls, judging by the youngsters tested.

Dr. Cushing points out that possibly "much of the behavior at present ascribed to stupidity, disobedience, defiance, stubbornness, lack of cooperativeness, might be better explained on the grounds of the presence to a high degree of a perseverating tendency."

Further exploration of this trait, which has been recognized by psychologists for some years but has never been intensively studied, is advocated by Dr. Cushing, who believes that it may be important in understanding adults as well as children, and that it may be important in vocational pursuits.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE LOOKS AHEAD TO A NEW ERA

Shipping Board Chairman Surveys Progress Since the War and Explains Added Stimulus of the Present Program

By T. V. O'CONNOR,
Chairman United States Shipping Board.

IN marked contrast to the present deplorable state of world shipping, which for some time has been floundering about in the doldrums, the American Merchant Marine, after years of aimless drifting, has at last been favored with a fair wind and is now making rapid progress in the direction of its objective. Before considering the future of American shipping it might be well to examine for a moment the two pictures thus indicated: First, the world shipping situation generally; second, the present status of the American Merchant Marine in particular.

The larger and more unfavorable picture shows us millions of tons of laid-up shipping, our records disclosing that hundreds of vessels are being maintained in a state of costly idleness by the ship owners of the great maritime nations. This condition is due not so much to a surplus of ships as to a subnormal demand for cargo space. Economists tell us that the present lethargy in international trade is largely the consequence of overproduction of the great staple commodities. The world, according to this doctrine, is overstocked with pretty much everything. Especially are there too much coal and oil, too much steel, too much tea and coffee, too much sugar, too much wheat, too much cotton and wool, too much rubber.

Factors Hindering Trade.

Students of the situation believe that among the more important secondary factors contributing to the slowing up of international trade are the concentration of gold in the United States and France, with consequent handicaps to credit and exchange, and a rather unlooked for growth of the spirit of nationalism, despite counter influences which are working to bring about international cooperation in problems having world-wide scope and application. Irrespective of our individual predilections, it is probably true that the nationalistic principle, carrying in its train the twin-concepts of trade barriers and domestic self-sufficiency, is by no means best calculated to promote international trade and the growth of merchant marines.

In order to correct the present ills of world trade there is a choice of two remedies, equally difficult to apply. The more advanced nations must either curtail production or they must find ways to stimulate the purchasing power of vast numbers of the world's inhabitants, in the latter case paying special attention to the undeveloped possibilities of Africa, Asia and South America.

The American Outlook.

In the midst of disturbed world conditions—at the very time that foreign ship owners are anxiously scanning the horizon for signs of trade improvement, and while foreign yards are complaining of the dearth of orders for new construction—it may seem strange that we in this country, long taunted for our alleged lack of "shipmindedness," should at last actually be placing upon the sea a strong and modern merchant fleet, built in American yards, financed by American citizens, operated by American corporations, manned largely by Americans, and designed eventually to carry the greater portion of our foreign commerce. How has this astonishing development come about and to what extent will it influence the realignment of ocean transportation on the trade lanes of the world?

There can be only one answer to the first part of this query. The United States is building up an adequate merchant fleet because the American people, after years of comparative inactivity in maritime affairs, have finally decided to own and operate their own ocean carriers. Whatever other considerations, such as solicitude for national safety, may have prompted this determination, it is based largely on changing economic conditions, by virtue of which an increasing proportion of the output of American industry is destined for the export trade. Those most directly concerned have come to see how extremely vital it is, especially in time of emergency, that American citizens should control the transport system upon which the movement of this marketable surplus depends.

The Board and Its Problems.

The decision to possess an adequate merchant fleet of their own was reached by the people of the United States in 1916, when the Shipping Board was established and clothed with power to bring into being, and to regulate and foster, an adequate merchant marine under the American flag. The board's task, an arduous one at any time, has been rendered a thousandfold more difficult by reason of its responsibility for the government's great emergency fleet, totaling approximately 2,550 vessels, whose acquisition became necessary as a war measure and whose disposition has constituted one of the board's chief post-war activities.

Fortunately, it was found that the best units of the emergency fleet could be used as a nucleus around which to built up the permanent merchant marine—the latter, of course, to be owned and operated by private American interests. The great clutter of vessel property left over from the war period has thus been of inestimable value to the Shipping Board in re-establishing our commercial position at sea. Steamship lines have been formed, operated in foreign trade for government account, and sold to private capital just as soon as they gave promise of attractive financial returns. Already the time is in sight when all the lines so established will have been disposed of to private American interests.

Liquidation of the emergency fleet has thus been managed, in a way, to further the board's major work of establishing the merchant marine on a firm and permanent basis. The two lines of endeavor, carried on simultaneously, may be said to constitute the government's post-war shipping policy as laid down by Congress and put into effect by the Shipping Board, acting with the sympathetic counsel of the Chief Executive.

Meeting Foreign Rivalry.

For some years it has been recognized that the government's shipping policy, while developed and clarified to some extent by the merchant marine act of 1920, still required that something more tangible be done for the private American owner in order to enable him to cope with the shipbuilding and ship operating differentials which, for obvious reasons, have long favored our foreign competitors. A momentous step in this direction was taken on May 22, 1928, when the Jones-White act, with its liberal provisions for construction loans and ocean mail contracts, became the law of the land.

©Underwood & Underwood.
T. V. O'Connor.

It is believed that the two provisions just mentioned coupled with other statutes now on the books or to be placed there in the future, will enable the American ship owner to build his ships in American yards and, in normal times, operate them at a profit under the American flag. If this belief is correct, then the United States stands on the threshold of a mighty renaissance of American shipping.

Indeed, we see on every hand the most gratifying indications of what may be expected from the new order of things. Already the Jones-White act has prompted a shipbuilding program that will give to American-flag lines operating in foreign trade something like seventy new ships within the next few years, involving a total investment of about $277,000,000. In type and design these ships will be modern in every respect. As their speeds will range from thirteen to twenty-eight knots, many of them will have potential value as naval auxiliaries in time of national emergency. Construction loans on the new vessels have already been granted to the extent of more than $107,000,000.

Coastwise and Foreign Trade.

The much discussed ocean mail contracts, provided by the Jones-White act with a view to the equalizing of differentials in operating costs, are awarded, under certain conditions, only to vessels engaged in foreign trade. Counting vessels of 1,000 gross tons and over, there are approximately 1,800 ships of about 10,000,000 tons, making up this portion of the American Merchant Marine. The coastwise trade, restricted to American flag tonnage and carried on by some 770 vessels of about 3,800,000 gross tons, is faced with no operating differentials and therefore does not benefit by the mail contract provisions of the law.

While both trades—foreign and coastwise—will continue to have their peculiar problems, it is obvious that those affecting our protected domestic shipping will give less cause for anxiety and will be more readily solved than those relating to our deep-water carriers. Although at present the coastwise fleet is having its troubles, we hope that the early future will see an adjustment of the difficulties, preferably through mutual understanding arrived at by the carriers themselves.

Future problems in both trades will prove less difficult of solution, less fraught with danger to the merchant marine, than those which have perplexed us in the past, when the whole scheme was in the experimental stage and when there were no evidences of that growing spirit of solidarity which is becoming more and more manifest among members of the shipping industry. Only in recent years have representatives of the owners, operators and allied interests met together in annual conferences, under the auspices of the Shipping Board, to discuss outstanding problems and decide on questions of future policy. These annual meetings, invariably marked by a spirit of good-will and mutual helpfulness, promise much for the future of American shipping.

Advantages of the Plan.

The American Merchant Marine of the future will act in closer cooperation with American railroads and waterways, as well as with the rapidly expanding commercial aircraft services. It will more and more tend to stabilize ocean rates, will save the people of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars in ocean freight charges which are now being paid to foreign interests, and will assure them a naval auxiliary on which they can depend in event the nation's safety is ever menaced from without.

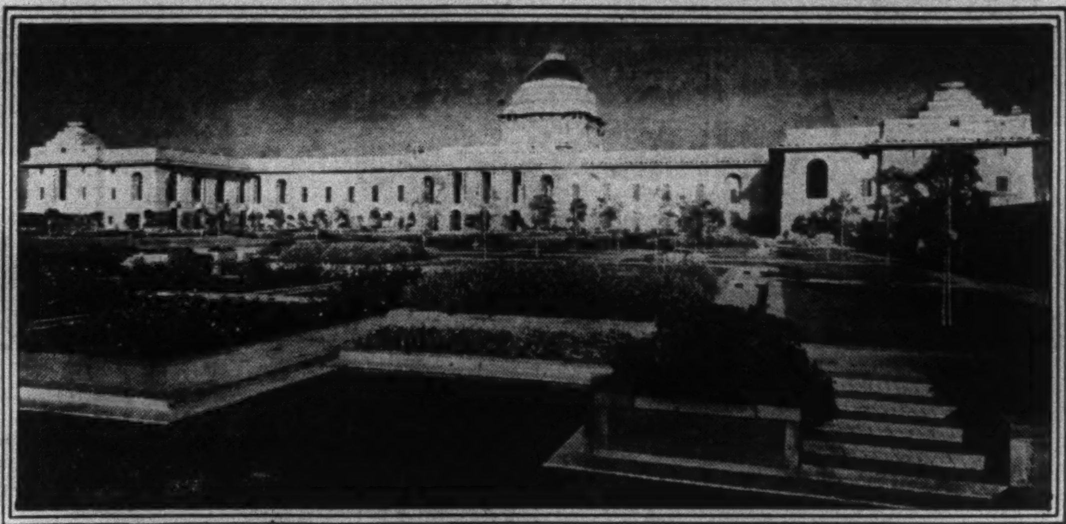
History and experience both demonstrate that the chief elements in the realm of transportation are constantly changing—that nowhere in the whole field are to be found static conditions. Competition, fluctuating economic factors, the progress of science and invention, new standards of safety and service, all make for change. We see the tramp steamer being succeeded by the fast liner and bulk freight moving at speeds that only yesterday were reserved for passengers traveling de luxe. We note the rapid development of internal combustion engines; we see, in the course of a few years, whole fleets of motorships entering the picture to compete with steam. Marine engineers have been busy applying other new ideas to merchant ships, including high-pressure steam, the turbo-electric drive and the use of pulverized coal for fuel.

The rapidity with which conditions change is sometimes disconcerting. "We are no longer railroads alone," said the president of a railroad which conducts a coast-to-coast service by rail and plane; "we are transportation companies. We must be prepared to offer you railroad service where it is most desirable, or bus service, or service by airplane."

It is not reported that the official just quoted said anything about "service by steamship," for he was looking inland and not seaward. And yet who can doubt the modern American trend—a trend that applies at sea as well as on the land—first to greater comfort and increased speed, and, second, to combinations of services, only now beginning to be planned, by which transportation by rail, water, and air will be coordinated. In this connection it will be recalled that the Shipping Board was a pioneer in demonstrating the feasibility of combining airplane and airship service with that furnished by the fast modern steamer.

Better and speedier ships, operating under private American ownership in well-ordered and well-regulated companies, under conditions that assure a reasonable financial return in the face of foreign competition—that, in a word, is a picture of the American Merchant Marine as it is destined to appear in the not very distant future. In order to bring about this result, American ships must, of course, merit and enjoy the whole-hearted support of American exporters, importers and ocean travelers.

THE VICEROY'S HOUSE, A UNIT OF INDIA'S CAPITAL



Showing the Moghul Gardens Which Embellish the Site of the New Palace at Delhi

INDIA'S NEW CAPITAL ON HISTORIC LAND

Site of Imperial Delhi Is Famous as the Scene of Great Battles and Sieges

ALLAHABAD.

THE new capital of India may not be as beautifully located amid lovely natural surroundings as Canberra or Darul-Aman, the new capital of Afghanistan, or as luxuriously built as Washington, but it has a romance of antiquity which is perhaps denied to its competitors. The imperial city of Delhi, the Rome of Asia—(Von Orlich calls it "The Indian Rome"), with its surrounding area of forty-five square miles of suburban territory, teems with relics of empires dating back to several centuries before the Christian Era. It is not one city, it is rather a conglomeration of numerous townships, each of which, Phoenix-like, gave place to its successor.

Lord Curzon described Delhi as "the deserted cities of dreary and disconsolate tombs." "In the above area of seven castles and fifty-two gates," says Mr. Finch, a European merchant who visited India in 1611, "thirteen capital cities have appeared and disappeared, the sites of which, with but one exception, are either marked by ruins or indicated by tradition. The eye can still trace the proud forts, spacious streets, minaretted mosques and beautiful tombs.

An Eventful History.

"Probably more battles, sieges, massacres, and murders crowd the annals of this town than those of any other similar area throughout the world. Its central location, the facility of obtaining good building materials from the rocky ridges with quartzite cores, which abound in the vicinity, perhaps account for the pre-eminent position Delhi has enjoyed since prehistoric times."

"It is my desire that the planning and designing of the public buildings to be erected will be considered with the greatest deliberation and care so that the new creation may be in every way worthy of this ancient and beautiful city," said George V, Emperor of India, on Dec. 15, 1911, when he laid the foundation stone of the new city.

The focal point of the new city is located on Raisina Hill. This is a large mass of rock fifty feet high, twenty feet of which was blasted away and filled to form a uniform thirty-foot platform. Around it was built a redstone wall, "comparable to the great platform base of Persepolis, on which Darius lifted up the privileged royal enclosure in enjoyment of the view and air above the city below."

The Government Centre.

The government buildings are arranged symmetrically about what is practically the east and west axis connecting the focal point with the northwestern gate of the old fort of Indrapat, the legendary Hindu city whose half-ruined forts and mansions are the wonder of tourists. The two great blocks of the Secretariat buildings are situated to the north and south of this focal point, with the government court between them. To the west the forum connects Raisina Hill with the high ground of the southern ridge, so that the whole government centre appears to be built on a spur of the ridge itself. This raised forum is known as the Viceroy's Court and is reached from the north and south by roadways with easy gradients. At the western extremity of this court is the Viceroy's house, built at a cost of about $5,000,000.

The Viceroy's house, too, is approached both from the north and south along fine avenues, which touch on the west the spacious Viceregal estate, with its lovely gardens and well-kept parks. Here are located the bungalows of the Viceroy's numerous secretaries, the house surgeon, the household controller, quarters for the Viceroy's bodyguard and other staffs. Viceroy's house and the two blocks of the Secretariat have been planned as one group of the capital facing east, silhouetted on the west by the forested southern ridge.

A Beautiful Setting.

Below the eastern façade of the Secretariat where crossroads meet, a forecourt, the great place, is laid out. This is partially enclosed by beautiful pierced railings, like those of the Buddhist shrines, in red sandstone, and is adorned with six water basins and fountains. From the above focus the main road of the capital—the Processional Way—leads eastward. On either side of it are rows of jaman and orange trees, lawns, flower beds and palatial residences of the members of the Viceroy's executive council. Two waterways run all along the Processional Way. At its eastern end is a park, hexagonal in shape, wherein has been erected the war memorial, a monument in the form of a triumphal arch.

Built in white stone upon a red sandstone base and rising to a height of 162 feet, the memorial structure consists of a mass pierced through from east to west by the great arch, 87½ feet high and 35 feet wide, spanning the Processional Way. The piers thus formed are pierced by smaller arches which run through at right angles to the main arch. Above the great cornice is inscribed "India," flanked by "1914" and "1919."

Along a second principal avenue in this section of the city have been built large buildings to accommodate, among other institutions, the Imperial Record Office and the Ethnological and War Museums. The Medical Research Institute and Library are to follow.

At the end of this second avenue toward the north, or the old city, is situated the business centre of the new capital. This consists of a circus 1,600 feet in diameter, around which are arranged twelve blocks of buildings each three stories high. Of the twelve roads which radiate from this centre, the northward will house the proposed railway station—perhaps the biggest structure of its kind in India.

SOME HUMAN ASPECTS IN THE DROUGHT BELT

tana," and adds that the forenoons have also been hot. Rain has failed those who depended upon it, and in addition the dry farmers have suffered. Water for the irrigation ditches of the Milk River district is stored in Glacier National Park, among the peaks and valleys familiar to thousands of tourists, then brought down, partly on Canadian territory, by way of the St. Mary's and Milk Rivers. This year the hot sun and dry winds have sucked up more than a third of the normal flow and the water has moved so slowly that it has been weeks late in reaching the thirsty land.

What stands out in many of the detailed reports from communities here and there half way across the continent is the calmness and even the good humor with which the unprecedented situation has been met, and the resourcefulness of those who have suffered from it. In the midst of the prevailing desolation people chuckle as they tell such stories as that of the farmer near Zionsville, Ind., who bought two bushels of Kentucky beans when every one else was going in for more ambitious crops, raised a fine crop and cleared $600 when all his neighbors were losing money

Although the total losses approach or surpass those of the most disastrous floods and other natural calamities the psychological reaction throughout the drought area is described as one of calmness. The dry spell came on like a slow but fatal disease, with no violent symptoms, so gradually as to be almost imperceptible. People are going about what work there is to do as though the clutch of habit had not been loosened. The most noticeable effect is a kind of apathy, due partly to the heat and partly to discouragement as to the utility of human efforts in the face of nature's apparent hostility. But there has been nothing resembling panic, even in communities where the supply of water, even for drinking purposes, has been seriously threatened.

Old-timers have been casting back in their memories and in the records for data about other droughts. The nearest approach to the present drought in some parts of Ohio was in the dry year of 1895. Elderly farmers recall that in some parts of the State at that time there was no real rain from April to October—a condition comparable with the normal dry season on the Pacific Coast. The heat, however, was not so pronounced as it has been this Summer. There were areas then in which every month produced a light frost. The salvation of 1895 was a series of heavy dews that kept vegetation nourished and the year ended with fair crops after a great deal of worry and uncertainty.

An Old-Time Drought.

At Somerset, in the mining region of Ohio, descendants of the Rev. Joseph A. Roof of Circleville, a nearby farming town, produced Mr. Roof's 90-year-old diary. "From June 13, 1838, until May, 1840," so runs one of the entries, "not sufficient rain fell to moisten the earth two inches. The dry spell lasted twenty months. All vegetation failed and most of the streams dried up." The people of Somerset are inclined to think that they are at least a little better off than their ancestors and predecessors.

In the midst of the drought Ohio farmers received questionnaires from the Federal government touching upon conditions in the arid districts. They did not object to answering the questionnaires but they did resent somewhat the fact that the questions relating to their own welfare and the state of their stock and crops were down at the bottom of the list, whereas the inquiries opened with what seemed a breathless concern on the part of the government as to the welfare of the fish in the streams.

STATES SPEED ROAD WORK.

HIGHWAY departments of the forty-eight States improved a total of 32,522 miles of State highways in 1929, according to figures compiled by the United States Bureau of Public Roads. This is an increase of 3,270 miles over the 1928 figure. The total mileage in the State highway systems at the end of 1929 was 314,136.

TARIFF REFORM FIGHT IN BRITAIN

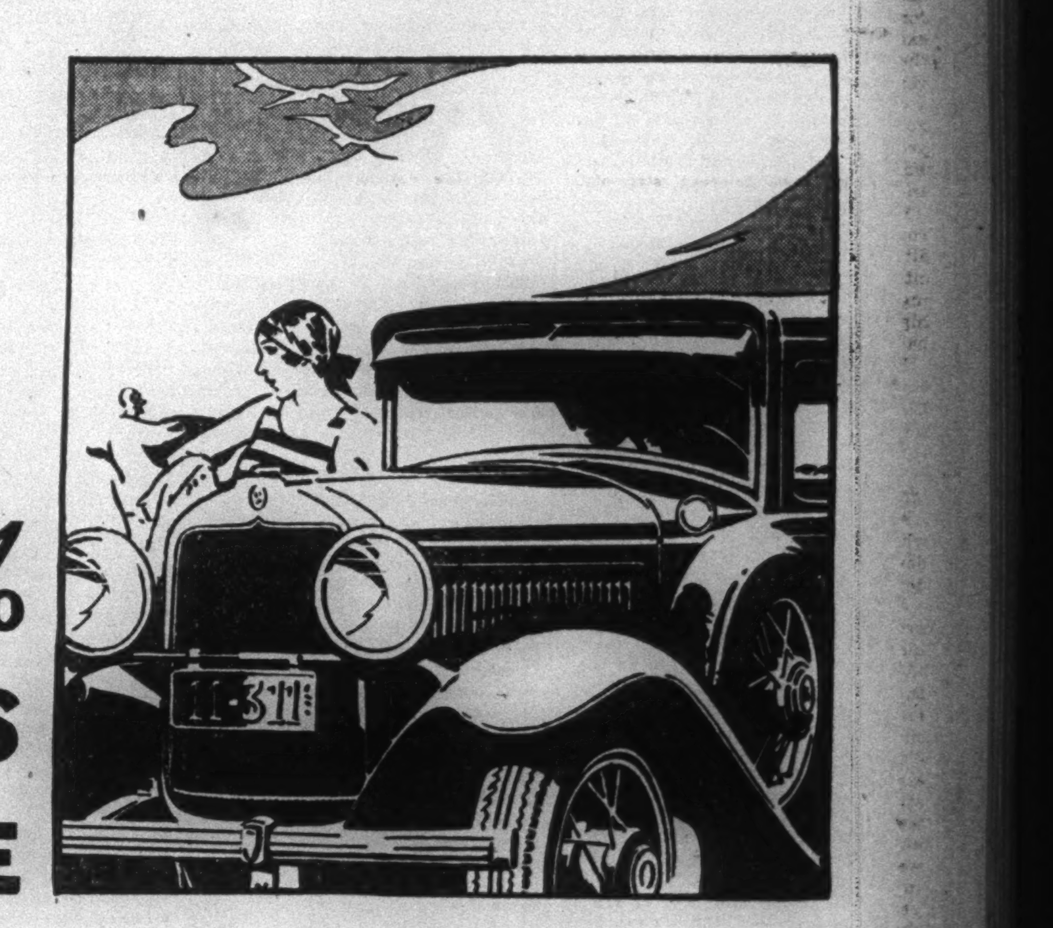
Typical of the dominion attitude were recent statements by James Edward Fenton, Australian Minister of Customs, and Sir James Parr, High Commissioner for New Zealand in England. "If British manufacturers want Australian trade," said Mr. Fenton, "let them establish themselves here and enjoy the protection of the Commonwealth." "There is a good deal of talk about free trade within the empire," said Sir James. "I approve the principle entirely, but there are some difficulties. We have our own manufactures in New Zealand, making some of the goods you make (in Great Britain) but which you make cheaper. Things will have to be adjusted gradually so that the people of New Zealand do not suffer." When Lord Beaverbrook first proposed his protectionist plan, Lord Cushendun, a Conservative, said in the House of Lords that it was not practicable because it would not appeal to the dominions.

As regards the crown colonies and protectorates—where Lord Beaverbrook proposed that empire free trade should be begun—the problem is a different one. These territories are not virtually independent nations, as the dominions are. They are administered by governors under authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and their legislation is largely in the hands of the Crown alone. With them Britain has a freer hand—excepting for treaty restrictions. For example, the British territories in the Congo Basin—Kenya, Uganda, Nyasaland, Zanzibar and parts of Rhodesia and the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan—are prohibited by the Treaty of St. Germain from granting tariff preferences to Great Britain. The same restrictions apply to the mandated territories—Palestine, Togoland, the Cameroons, &c.—though the mandates held by the dominions are not subject to such a provision.

But the obstacles to empire protection are not all on the side of the dominions and colonies. There are important ones in Britain itself. It is not to be assumed that all of the bankers agree with the protectionist manifesto issued by a group of them.

Probably the greatest obstacle of all, on the British side, is the public's long-standing prejudice against tariffs in general and especially tariffs which would increase the price of food. Mr. Baldwin has been chary of committing himself to food taxes. He displeased the protection enthusiasts by promising that if returned to power he would not impose such taxes until he had referred the question to the country in a referendum. Labor and the Liberals, of course, would oppose stubbornly any tariff on food—indeed, any protective tariff whatever.

The British delegates to the World Economic Conference in Geneva three years ago warned their colleagues that if other countries maintained a ring of hostile tariffs, protectionist sentiment in Great Britain would be sure to increase. It is the resentment over foreign tariffs—over what is considered the unequal position of Britain among trading nations—as well as the desperate state of British trade, that has provoked the protectionist campaign.



13% SALES INCREASE

TOURING ONTARIO'S LAKES

Network of Highways Connects a Variety of Picturesque Resorts Across the Province

By LEON A. DICKINSON.

OF the two principal gateways into Ontario from New York State the one that carries the greatest volume of traffic is that through Niagara Falls. This is logical, as the Falls themselves constitute a great attraction. Moreover, it is but a short drive from there round the end of Lake Ontario to Toronto, the point of entrance into the enchanting lake district a few miles to the northward.

With a population of upward of 700,000 and covering an area of thirty-two square miles, Toronto is by far the most important city of Ontario. The roads in all directions out of the city are good, making it possible to try numerous jaunts to beautiful lakes and other resorts that lie within two or three hours' drive from the city. The accompanying map shows the main routes.

Lake Simcoe, one of the largest and most attractive lakes in Ontario, is but fifty miles or so to the northward, and is reached very quickly over an excellent, paved highway. Just north of Lake Simcoe, and really a continuation of it, is the companion Lake Couchiching, the two constituting a resort region that has few counterparts anywhere in Eastern Canada.

At the southern end of the lake are the popular resorts of Sutton and Jackson's Point, while on the eastern shore is Beaverton, a market town with ample accommodations for Summer visitors. Barrie, on the west side of the lake, is a large town with excellent hotels and a well-located golf course.

A few miles northeast of Barrie, on Ontario Route 11, is Orillia, situated on a lovely strait and having thirteen miles of waterfront. Here, too, is an excellent golf course as well as provision for water sports of all kinds. Many pleasant water trips may be taken from Orillia, including a launch excursion down the Severn River to picturesque Sparrow Lake, another excellent resort region.

Less than twenty-five miles north of Orillia is Gravenhurst, at the southern end of the famous Muskoka Lakes. These include three large lakes and several smaller ones, the whole grouped close together to form one of the most attractive areas in the entire Province. Muskoka Lake, the largest of the group, is twenty-one miles in length, while Lakes Rosseau and Joseph are almost as long and, though comparatively narrow in places, widen out in stretches of open water fully six miles in width.

To the Muskoka Lakes.

The tourist who wishes to view to best advantage the attractiveness of Muskoka Lakes should keep left at Gravenhurst and follow a good gravel road that leads direct to Bala on the western extension of Muskoka Lake, where the Muskosh River, which is the outlet for this entire chain of lakes, pours over a beautiful cascade and winds its way through woodland scenery to Georgian Bay.

Bala is a convenient base point for fishermen, conoeists and hunters. Those who can spare a little time for sightseeing should plan to stop at Bala for a day or two and take one or more of the steamer trips—the best way to see the lakes.

Lake Rosseau is by many considered the fairest of the lakes in the Muskoka group. Off to the west of this lake, and connected thereto by a rather tortuous channel, is the third of the big lakes that constitute this Summer playground. This is Lake Joseph, whose wide, open stretches are the joy of the yachtsman.

Everywhere throughout this picturesque region are ample facilities for bathing, fishing, boating and canoeing, while at frequent intervals the golfer will find excellent courses.

Whether or not the tourist pauses long enough to take a boat trip, he will continue on from Bala, following the western side of Lake Joseph for a few miles, and then bear left direct at Parry Sound, on far-famed Georgian Bay. This place constitutes the principal gateway to the so-called 30,000 islands and is a paradise for the sportsman.

The town commands a magnificent view of Georgian Bay. Here, again, those with a little time to spare can take a boat trip to Pointe au Baril, some twenty miles to the northwest. This trip is most delightful, the ever-changing scenery with miles of reefs and shoals and pine-clad islands opening new vistas of beauty at every turn.

From Parry Sound it is but a few miles eastward to the Lake of Bays. The scenery here is much like that of the Muskoka district, with gleaming stretches of open water and an endlessly serrated shore line that accounts for the name bestowed upon it.

If the tourist does not intend to explore the region around North Bay and other sections of Northern Ontario, he will doubtless swing back to the Muskoka territory, joining the main north and south highway at Bracebridge. From there he will drive southward to Gravenhurst and then retrace the outgoing route at least as far as Orillia. Here, if desired, he may turn westward on a good gravel round that leads direct to another gateway to the 30,000 islands at Midland and Pentanguishene.

From either of these points the motorist will drive southward for a few miles and then west to the well-known resort of Wasaga Beach. Just beyond this is a junction point with Route 26 that leads along the south shore of the bay through Collingwood, Thornbury and Meaford to the city of Owen Sound. This is the starting point for delightful trips by boat or automobile to points on the Bruce Peninsula, to the northwest.

A run of about twenty miles west from Owen Sound across the base of the Bruce Peninsula next brings the tourist to Southampton, ready for a delightful run southward along the Blue Water Highway.

Other Resort Regions.

Lest we be accused of playing favorites, this account cannot be brought to a close without some mention, at least, of two other resort regions equally well worth visiting in that Province. These are the Kawartha Lakes, about 100 miles by road from Toronto in a northeasterly direction, and the Rideau Lakes, just to the north of Kingston and the Thousand Islands.

The tourist who enters Ontario by way of the Thousand Islands will find it simple to make a swing through the very heart of the Rideau Lake region, returning to the main highway at Kingston. He may then follow Route 2 westward along the north side of Lake Ontario to Port Hope, where a right turn and a run of about thirty miles to the north will bring him to Peterboro and the southern entrance to the Kawartha Lakes.

From Peterboro one may drive west through Lindsay to a point just north of Sunderland, where a right turn on Route 12 will bring one after a few miles to Orillia. From this point the tour described above may be taken through the Muskoka Lakes, Lake of Bays and Georgian Bay regions.

The latest bulletin of the Ontario Department of Public Highways reports most of the routes in that Province in generally good condition at the present time.

ONTARIO'S RESPONSIBILITY MEASURE WILL FIX DRIVERS' INSURANCE RATES

OTTAWA.

ON Sept. 1 there will go into effect throughout the Province of Ontario a new piece of legislation—called the "Safety Responsibility" law—similar to the "financial responsibility" measures already adopted in various American States.

The new law applies to all automobiles, motor trucks, trailers, motorcycles and tractors, and its full effect will be attained gradually as the reckless drivers meet their inevitable day in court.

Provision is made for reciprocity with other Provinces of Canada and the American States. The regular procedure will follow on receipt of official notice that an Ontario driver has committed elsewhere any offense which if done in this Province would have brought him under the act. If a non-resident is an offender or fails to satisfy a judgment he is denied the privilege of driving in Ontario until he has met the judgment and makes provision for the future.

An important clause establishes the principle of increased insurance premiums to be charged drivers who have offended under the law. When records have been kept for what is considered a sufficient period, such drivers will be classified under A, B and C for minor offenses, more serious ones and grave offenses, and the insurance companies will be required to charge the A class a rate higher than standard by 10 per cent, the B class by 25 per cent and the C class by 50 per cent. Through good behavior drivers may improve their rating by one class in each twelve months.

There are other interesting provisions. A liability policy issued by an insurance company cannot be contested because of misrepresentations made in the application, although the company in such an event has an action in law against the policyholder. Again, proof of responsibility may be demanded, though no accident or violation has occurred, from persons under 21 or above 65 applying for permits.

AT THE WHEEL

By JAMES O. SPEARING

MURRAY BAY, Quebec.

THERE'S no denying that the tourists have discovered the Province of Quebec, and it is as useless to deny that the provincials have discovered the tourists, too. On the road that follows the north shore of the St. Lawrence River, for instance, the migrating American motorist may notice a large sign at his left proclaiming the presence of "Lindy's House—A Home Away From Home," and this may make it difficult for him to realize that he is really away from home. Certainly he saw something like that sign in New Jersey, Iowa, Arkansas or some other State through which he passed at fifty miles an hour. He may blink his eyes and look again and wonder whether he is in French Canada after all.

He will not wonder long if he looks again, for the sign is passed in a flash, and just beyond it, perhaps, is a native woman weaving homespun in front of her little house, or another sign—such as "Assorted Sandwich" or "Hotel 500 Feets Ahead"—which, by the unsuccess of its effort at English, unintentionally emphasizes the essential genuineness of native scene. And if anything on the left seems too successfully imported—and therefore misplaced—there is always the St. Lawrence River on the right. It has not been brought from New Jersey or Iowa or Arkansas, but it brings motorists from those and all the other States and gives them even more lasting satisfaction than the accommodating Quebec liquor law.

One of the first things discovered by tourists in French Canada was the dogcart. It was noted as unusual and catalogued as "quaint." It was, and to some extent still is, a utilitarian factor in native life. Large dogs hitched to little wagons, driven by small boys, came into being in this part of the world because they were found to be useful in local light delivery service. They were considered no more unusual along the St. Lawrence than mules in the cotton fields of the South. But tourists to whom mules were a familiar sight were amused by the dogcarts and stopped to take pictures of them whenever they could catch a young driver not too timid to pose. Now the young drivers have trained their dogs to wear derby hats or hold pipes in their mouths. They stand beside the road as targets for the snapshooting passer-by, who, after he—or she, it may be—has had the fun of taking such a "cute" photograph usually throws the boy several cents or perhaps a dime.

Evidences of such ballyhoo are noticeable along the road between the city of Quebec and Sainte Anne de Beaupré, the site of the well-known shrine, because, of course, this short stretch of twenty-two miles is, probably, one of the most traveled motorways in the entire Province. A large majority of the thousands who visit Quebec go to Sainte Anne de Beaupré by trolley, car or bus, and it is inevitable that the honest natives should try to please them in every way they can. American money looks as good to them as it does to Americans, and if they did not attempt to attract a little of it they would not be natural. They would be dumb.

No one is really hurt by the roadside ballyhoo. Those who would prefer the original life to remain original in all its aspects soon discover that such things as dogs in derbies are only occasional and superficial after all. French Canadian life remains fundamentally original. The really remarkable thing is that it so strongly and continuously persists despite the attacks of tourist observation and exclamation. It seems impossible that any people who find themselves a show to others should refrain from showing off, yet these home folk remain primarily simple folk at home. One has only to talk with them a while to discover that. Even the little boys of the trick-dog carts are genuine French-Canadian boys who, if you toss them a few pennies after a photograph, will throw in an extra smile without realizing that it, too, is part of the show to you.

Most of the motorists who drive out from Quebec to Ste. Anne de Beaupré don't go any further than that. The road beyond is something of a dead end—although it seems contradictory to call anything that virtually ends in Murray Bay "dead." It will undoubtedly become a popular tourist route when the highway east of Murray Bay, through St. Siméon and up around Lac Saint Jean is completed, but at the present time sections of this road between St. Siméon and the lake are under construction, and only those motorists willing to dare a possibly difficult trip attempt the drive.

For this year's average tourist, therefore, the highway continues from Ste. Anne de Beaupré, through Murray Bay, to St. Siméon, where, so far as they are concerned, it stops. After they have spent some time in Ste. Anne they are usually in a hurry to get back to Quebec for luncheon or dinner, so they turn around in front of the famous shrine. And thus they miss one of the finest drives in all this part of the Province of Quebec.

In the first place, as the tourist travel stops at Ste. Anne, so does the ballyhoo. It is only about seventy miles to Murray Bay, known to the French as La Malbaie, but the drive offers all of seventy miles of scenic and human interest. The St. Lawrence widens on the right, the people are more simple at home, and soon the Laurentians begin to pile up their blue mass between you and the sky ahead. It's not a scene to rave about. If one begins to gush adjectives he suddenly remembers the woman he heard photographing the dog in the derby hat. He is silenced by the scene—and the true greatness of any scene is demonstrated by its ability to silence the vox populi.

From Murray Bay the traveler may drive back to Quebec or on to St. Siméon, where he can take a boat across the St. Lawrence to Riviére-du-Loup. If he has the time, it makes a restful break in the trip to stop for a night—and the next day and night, perhaps—in one of the alluring spots on Murray Bay itself. There are several attractive hotels here, and, of course, the magnificent Manoir Richelieu, built on a high bluff above the river for people who want a vacation in this exhilarating northern land. It is pleasant to get to Murray Bay—and hard to get away—but there are also many magnetic miles beyond.

THE NEWS FROM DETROIT

Production in Most Plants Continues at Low Level—Parts Business Continues to Make Gains

By FRED KINGSBURY.

DETROIT.

ALL automobile manufacturing plants, with the exception of one, are working, after having been closed for periods of from two to three weeks. The exception will be closed for one week more. With the exception of two plants, which are running this week close to capacity, the others are on a low output rate and, from indications at the present time, there are no hopes for a boost in production, despite the fact that rumors going the rounds in some cities outside Detroit are to the effect that the automobile business is showing steady gains.

The increases anticipated in August have not been forthcoming thus far, nor are there any indications of any material gains in sight, although every one identified with the automotive business is hoping for better conditions.

While a great many automobile workers are back at work, this does not mean that they are getting a full week's employment every week. The "staggered system" of employment is still being maintained in order to give as many workers employment as possible.

The sales departments at the various factories are extremely busy and are going out after business. However, they are not using forceful methods, despite reports to the contrary. Sales and production are running along on practically the same level, and stocks of cars at factories have never been at a lower level. In fact, some models are being made on order to avoid tying up money in completed models.

There has been considerable discussion about the automobile parts business during the past few weeks. The parts industry has been very successful so far this year and forecasts are to the effect that this good business will continue throughout the Fall months. However, it is feared in some quarters that there may be an opening up in credit and the majority of good business men believe this would be a mistake at the present time. Hence the watchfulness, so far as the parts business is concerned.

The term "alley" and "gyp" garages are fast disappearing, and in a couple of years these phrases will probably be things of the past. This will be due to the attitude of automobile manufacturers. One of the largest automobile makers in the country has taken cognizance of the independent garages and is working hand in hand with them. If any independent garage owner can qualify to the rules laid down by this manufacturer, he is given much assistance and is allowed to buy parts at a worth-while discount. This helps to boost parts sales of authorized dealers and in turn adds to the manufacturer's good-will.

HINTS TO DRIVERS

By ACCELERATOR.

AUTOMOBILE clubs and service companies report that a large majority of the emergency calls answered by them are due to troubles in ignition systems. You may avoid having to send in such a call yourself if you remember to have the units of the system checked by an expert periodically.

When you suddenly find yourself rushing to a bad hole in the road don't jam on your brakes—unless you have time to reduce your speed and release the brakes before you hit the hole. If you take it at high speed with the brakes on the result may be a broken spring.

Campers often find the pliers from the tool kit useful for lifting hot pots and pans—but don't leave them lying on the ground when you start out the next morning.

It is not enough to avoid running out of gas. Don't let it get too low in the tank, because sediment and water, which sink to the bottom, are sucked into the feed line and carburetor from a low tank—and trouble results.

Failure of your starting motor and eccentricity in your headlights—alternating dim and bright—may be due to imperfect connections between the battery terminals and the cables connecting them with the electrical system.

The drivers who dash up to traffic lights and then jam on the brakes for red, and those who try to jump to twenty-five miles an hour as soon as the light turns green, coat the concrete with rubber. Sudden stops and impulsive starts are hard on tires.

Don't be alarmed if the water in your radiator gets hot. When it is near the boiling point your engine is most efficient. You needn't do anything until the water actually boils.

ANNUAL BLESSING OF AUTOMOBILES DRAWS THOUSANDS OF MOTORISTS

IT has been the custom of travelers for many centuries to rely upon divine protection to save them from the dangers of road and sea; the recent blessing of automobiles at St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church in Pleasantville, N. J., is a modern expression of this. Thousands of motorists, during the last three years, have passed underneath St. Christopher's Porch, where, on the last occasion, Mgr. Edward C. Griffin and Father Francis McCallion, pastor of St. Peter's, imparted a special blessing on each car. As St. Christopher is the patron saint of travelers, the porch is appropriately named.

Recently a special blessing for automobiles has found its way into the Catholic ritual. The situation of St. Peter's near three busy highways makes it especially suited for the performance of this blessing, which has become a feature of the Summer season.

All who wish may witness the ceremony. About one thousand stayed to see the recent one. Like the annual blessing of the fishing fleet off the coast of Brittany, the ceremony is in keeping with the desire of the Church to bless those things used in our daily occupations. The ceremony is simple. At the recent blessing, a short procession of altar boys and clergy marched to St. Christopher's Porch, where Mgr. Griffin took his place to impart the blessing. A special medal of St. Christopher was given to each driver of a car.

In this manner St. Christopher, patron of all those who take to the highroad or the high seas, is invoked to look after his own. When St. Peter's recently built a lyceum, it took into consideration, in addition to the blessing of automobiles, the care of the motorists, providing a special waiting room, called St. Christopher's Rest Room, for the comfort and convenience of the passing motorist.

MAKING BETTER GEARSETS

Makers Concentrate on Improvements to Render Shifting Easier—Employ Different Methods

By WILLIAM ULLMAN.

THE automobile transmission has lately assumed the major share of the spotlight in the industry. Arrival of more four-speed gearset models, incorporation of "free-wheeling" in two companion cars, adoption of the syncro-mesh gearset in one of the stalwarts in the medium price field, and the use of "silent second" speeds, plus the dogged conviction of the three-speed advocates, all have served to focus attention on this once little-considered feature.

The various warring elements are now digging in for what observers believe will be a showdown struggle. Particularly happy over the turn of events is that small minority which has for years insisted that something ought to be done about the transmission, on the ground that it was the least efficient part of the car mechanism.

One of the gains of the public in the conflict will be an education in correct nomenclature as applied to the car. Actually, it is not the transmission, but only a part of it that is being subjected to so much redesign. That part is the gearset, the set of gears that permits a change of speeds. The transmission, speaking broadly, is the whole system of transmitting power—the clutch, gearset, universal joints, driveshaft and differential.

Two major issues are involved. The first of these concerns itself with easier and more silent gear-shifting. The second relates to whether engines are turning at crankshaft speeds that are too high from the standpoint of durability. Acceleration, high road speed and hill-climbing ability are also involved, though not to such extent.

Learning Again.

During the last two years, drivers who once regarded themselves skillful in handling gearshift levers have been grating and clashing gears like novices. Some of them have not been able to overcome it; others have found it necessary to double-clutch in order to get into high from second or vice versa, even under normal accelerating conditions.

The reason has been more mechanical than lack of skill on the driver's part. Heavier parts are being used on the drive mechanism and faster engines drive them. The fact of higher engine speeds has served as a double complication because, even at the same speeds, the gearset parts, being heavier, would have a tendency to keep moving a longer time. Their inertia would be greater.

In practice, it has worked out in this fashion: The driver has stepped harder on the accelerator in second speed, pushing the car to a higher road speed than in the past. This means that when the clutch is disengaged the driven members of the transmission and the driving members are turning at different speeds. Meshing them without clashing, therefore, has become a work of art that not every one has been able to achieve.

Out of this situation has come the "free-wheel" gearset and the adoption of the syncro-mesh transmission. Silent, easy gear-shifting is the objective of both of these developments.

They attack the problem from almost opposite quarters. The free-wheel gearset is one in which the gears are stopped when the accelerator is released. The syncro-mesh, instead of stopping the gears, takes them at any speed and automatically matches the rate at which they are turning. The free-wheel device permits shifting at any speed and in either direction between high and second gears without use of the clutch. The syncro-mesh unit permits the same practice, but calls for use of the clutch.

Both require modification of one's usual driving technique. In the case of the free-wheel transmission the clutch is not disengaged at all between second and high speeds, while the syncro-mesh gearset calls for abandonment of the delayed shift. The change, however, is not difficult in either case.

Function of "Silent Second."

In connection with gearset silence, many are confused by the "silent second" speed gearbox. Its primary function is to provide noiseless operation when the gears are in second. By using gears cut in an entirely different fashion—in herring-bone form—the sound produced when accelerating in second is eliminated. Two cars with excellent acceleration performance now are employing this feature and designers of others are checking its merits closely.

The good old-fashioned simple three-speed transmission still is working with complete satisfaction to both producer and consumer of the smaller popular priced cars. These still are powered by low-speed engines, although the power is higher than formerly. They also boast of excellent power-to-weight ratios, which make possible the use of an uncomplicated transmission without adverse effect upon performance.

The success of the smaller cars in this direction has set many to wondering if a solution of the transmission problem might not lie in the direction of making heavy cars lighter, thus improving the power-weight ratio. This is by no means easy, since sturdiness and weight of chassis and body must go hand in hand with high power.

The four-speed transmission proponents aim at reducing engine speeds rather than achieving silence in shifting. The fourth speed permits the use of a lower rear-end gear reduction which, in turn, gives a higher road speed for a lower engine speed.

One aspect of silence with which the four-speed gearset must be concerned is that with respect to third-speed operation. Third, in the four-speed transmission, is the accelerating and pulling combination, and it must be used quite frequently.

The Four-Speed Gearset.

So, the four-speed gearset has its silent third on the same principle as the three-speed transmission's "silent second." The manner in which this silence is achieved is different, however, not only as between the three-speed and four-speed gearsets but between various designs of the latter. Some insist that silence is achievable only by using internal gears—gears fitting inside of other gears. This premise was somewhat upset last Summer, however, by the introduction of a four-speed transmission on one of the country's most expensive cars which used a spur, or external gear, for third. This company maintains that the spur gear is more silent than the internal one and has the additional advantage of being simpler from an operation and maintenance standpoint.

An interesting transmission is the overdrive, incorporated in the roadster of a popular line. In this design, the engine turns at one speed, the propeller shaft at a higher one. In other words, the transmission is overdriven, as its name implies. While some designs of this type have been criticized, this particular one is said to have worked out quite satisfactorily.

Whatever the outcome, present differences about gearsets show a determination on the part of manufacturers to keep improving them.

CAR DESIGNERS KEEP TESTING TO PROVIDE GREATER COMFORT

Exhaustive Studies With Human Laboratory Subjects Aim at Eliminating Shocks to Nerves and Muscles

By JOHN T. VOGEL.

THAT tired feeling after a motor trip is being measured minutely. Some types of cars, some kinds of seating, some varieties of shock absorbers and springs cause discomfort sooner than others. The ordinary rider often knows that there's a difference, but to put his finger upon the dividing line is another matter.

A study of riding fatigue shows that it's more the nerves than the muscles that suffer. Nerves are notoriously jumpy things, difficult to get at, and affected by a multitude of stimuli varying from second to second. Yet the comfort of the motorist is of such fundamental importance to motor car and equipment makers that a group of them has financed a study of shocks and their causes. The study is literally exhaustive; human laboratory subjects have had their resistance worn down by automobiling and their reactions charted.

"Wabblemeters" have played an important part in the tests. After a typical eight-hour automobile ride the motorist is swaying and shaking more than twice as much as when he started, the machines show. The meters test a person's ability to maintain his equilibrium on his heels. A bell rings when his feet touch the front or sides of a small platform, and a delicately adjusted container releases a measureable amount of fluid for almost imperceptible movements.

F. A. Moss, M. D., who is continuing the tests, expects to extend them to a large number of taxicab and bus drivers and to other members of the general public. Dr. Moss is the head of the Department of Psychology in George Washington University. His findings are passed on to the Society of Automotive Engineers, whose members are charged with designing the hundreds of parts in the intricate assemblage which a buyer proudly refers to as "my car."

Through Trial and Error.

"Various types of springs, cushions and shock absorbers have been devised and tried," says Dr. Moss, "only to be replaced in time by what appeared to be an improved 'comfort-giving' device. A considerable amount of blind trial and error experimenting has characterized this search for devices that would insure a pleasant automobile ride. The result has been an immense amount of waste, with millions of dollars put into the manufacture of what proved to be unsatisfactory equipment.

"The reason for this waste has been the lack of objective recording devices by which the degree of comfort could be measured. In the absence of such measurement, the research engineers have had to depend very largely on the subjective 'hunches' of those who rode in automobiles. They have been in a position similar to that of the physician who was called in to treat a fever patient before the invention of the clinical thermometer. The patient could tell the physician that the former felt 'hot,' and the physician could conclude that the patient had a fever, but without the aid of the thermometer neither the physician nor the patient could tell just how 'hot' or how much fever.

"If we would know how a 1920 car compares in riding quality with the 1930 model, we can find our answer by taking a group of people and, having subjected them to similar riding conditions in the two cars, measuring the changes produced in the passengers by each ride.

Fatigue and Comfort.

"This is what we attempted to do. We began by studying the physiological changes in fatigue. It is much easier to measure fatigue than comfort. But there happens to be a very close relation between the two, and if you measure one you indirectly are measuring the other. As fatigue increases there is a tendency for comfort to decrease. In other words, comfort seems to be inversely proportional to fatigue."

Preliminary tests were made in the laboratory with the subjects riding a bicycle ergometer, or energy-measurer. Various blood examinations, heart records, respiration charts and other clinical data were gathered. The tests gave excellent measurements of marked muscular fatigue. But most of the tests were found to be not so well applicable to the less strenuous fatigue of automobile riding.

One promising test determined the ability of the blood to take up and transport to the lungs the waste product of carbon dioxide or carbonic acid. This is produced in respiration, and increases in amount as the energy of the body increases. But the test was abandoned as too difficult to apply generally.

Another test, which is being further standardized, deals with basal metabolism, or the degree in which the body works to build itself up and to excrete waste products. This test, easily applied, measures the individual's rate of consumption of oxygen, or "energy air."

Comparison of the results from the automobile experiments with those in the bicycle experiments indicates that motoring fatigue does not represent a very marked muscular fatigue, but suggests to Dr. Moss that it may represent a condition more closely similar to nerve fatigue.

"It has been claimed by physiologists and psychologists that actual nerve fatigue does not exist; that all fatigue is in reality muscular," he says. "But it has been demonstrated recently in the physiological laboratory that, in conducting impulses, nerves actually undergo considerable diminution in tissue substance, and that, under conditions of exercise, they show chemical and energy changes very similar to those shown in a fatigued muscle."

The initial step in the study of the nerve fatigue tests was to establish a normal or average for each subject, in each of the tests, the person chosen practicing the tests until the increase in performance due to added experience was eliminated. With the normal for each person established, the subjects underwent fatigue in the laboratory and then in motor riding.

The laboratory nerve fatigue was produced by having the subjects do mental multiplication problems continuously for five hours. Then followed one of the tests: Sheets containing 1,000 numbers had certain designated digits to be crossed out, the rating being based upon speed and accuracy. After fatigue by mental multiplication, there was an average decrease of 2.6 per cent in ability, as compared with ability to meet the test with fresh minds. With the same test, fatigue induced by riding produced a decrease in ability of from 2.3 to 16.9 per cent, depending upon the conditions of the trip as to distance, car and other factors. An eight-hour ride over very rough dirt and gravel road brought about the 16.9 per cent average decrease. The results in number checking were quite constant, there being practically no exceptions to a decrease in ability following fatigue. Those who had done the major part of the driving on the trips showed the largest decrease in ability to handle the number problem, the tests revealed.

In another test, for speed of reaction, subjects who tapped a telegraph key showed 6.9 per cent decrease in speed after mental multiplication, 11.5 per cent decrease after a 300-mile drive and 6.3 per cent decrease after a 150-mile drive over a poor road.

Mental multiplication after driving showed that the automobilists had an average decrease of 19.4 per cent in speed of solution and an average decrease of 18 per cent in the number of problems correctly solved in a unit of time. All the subjects showed a decrease in multiplying ability after the road tests.

The basal metabolism rate, or rate of consumption of oxygen, showed a constant increase after road trips. The increase varied from an average of 7 per cent to an average of 33 per cent, depending upon the length of the trip, the type of car used and the type of road traveled. The lowest average increase came after a half day's ride over good roads, and the highest average increase after a 150-mile ride over very bad roads.

Though a person may feel greatly fatigued after an automobile ride, and show it externally, blood counts, heart examinations and other physiological tests record no very great change. Dr. Moss believes that adrenalin, a secretion from body glands, has much to do with counteracting changes in the body, and records cases in which injections of adrenalin tended to keep the functionings of the body nearer to normal when exercising.

Admitting that frequently the persons tested felt greater discomfort than indicated by their fatigue charts, Dr. Moss says this may be due to the fact that there are elements of fatigue not measurable by the present methods, or that discomfort includes some elements entirely apart from fatigue itself. To give this indetermined personal factor weight in the conclusions, a "score card" is being standardized, upon which the rider underscores various kinds and degrees of discomfort he seems to feel.

THE INDUSTRY REPORTS

Hulett Retires From Business—Oakland-Pontiac and Hudson-Essex Companies Reduce Prices

ANNOUNCEMENT is made of the retirement from automobile row of John B. Hulett, for fifteen years associated with the industry and lately Franklin distributer in New York. The assets of the Hulett Motor Car Company, Broadway and Sixty-second Street, of which he was president, have been liquidated. Mr. Hulett gained his first automobile experience with the Pope Motor Car Company in Toledo. In 1910 he opened a branch in Chicago for the Lozier company, and two years later became associated with Chandler, an outgrowth of Lozier. Following an interlude of two years as Hudson distributer in Indiana, Mr. Hulett returned to the Chandler organization, becoming distributer in the New York territory. In August, last year, he joined Franklin. Mr. Hulett was an executive of the Automobile Merchants' Association of New York, Inc., first as president and later as secretary-treasurer.

The New York distributership for the Franklin line has been awarded to William Pase, who since last year has been the Brooklyn dealer for the company. The Franklin showrooms will continue at 1,834 Broadway.

Two Companies Cut Prices.

BOTH the Hudson Motor Car Company and the Oakland Motor Car Company announced last week substantial reduction on their lines of cars.

The cuts range from $100 on the brougham to $355 on the seven-passenger sedan of the Hudson series, and from $65 on the coupé to $300 on the sun-sedan of the Essex line.

The reductions on the Oakland eight and Pontiac six lines range from $80 to $170. The Oakland line is now listed at from $895 for the coupé, two-door sedan and roadster, to $1,045 for the custom sedan. The Pontiac Bix Six models now range from $665 for the coupé, two-door sedan and roadster, to $765 for the custom sedan. At the same time, announcement was made by Oakland-Pontiac officials of two new lines of cars, similar to the present models, which will be brought out in the Winter.

A new line of Studebaker trucks has been announced by the S. P. A. Truck Corporation, manufacturers of Studebaker and Pierce-Arrow trucks, delivery cars, buses, ambulances, funeral cars and other commercial vehicles. A heavy duty line of Pierce-Arrow trucks will be presented later. The Studebakers are of 1½ and 2 ton capacities, with 70-horsepower motors.

Appointment of Frank B. Sullivan as retail branch manager of the Pierce-Arrow Sales Corporation of New York City was announced last week by David J. Willoughby, general sales manager of the Pierce-Arrow Motor Car Company of Buffalo. Mr. Sullivan was formerly in charge of retail sales of Packard's New York branches.

Oil Chemists to Meet.

PETROLEUM experts from all parts of the country will assemble at the eightieth meeting of the American Chemical Society at Cincinnati, Sept. 8 to 12, to discuss developments in the industry. Papers dealing with the use of high pressures, the speeding up of production and changes in present laboratory methods will be presented. Experiments in the cracking of petroleum, "knocking" tendencies of commercial gasoline, formation of gum in motor fuels, and chemical reactions involved in gas absorption are among the subjects scheduled for discussion. One phase of the meeting will deal with progress in the rubber industry.

The general offices of the Moto Meter Gauge and Equipment Corporation of Long Island City are being moved to Toledo, Ohio, according to an announcement made by R. G. Martin, president of the company. The change is being made, it is said, in order to bring the executives of the sales and engineering departments into closer touch with the automotive industry. The corporation will, however, continue to maintain executive offices in New York.

NEWS ALONG THE MOTOR ROUTES

Road Conditions in New York State—A Direct Route to Long Beach—Builders to Report on Highway Problems

TRAVEL conditions on the principal highways of New York State, as reported in the latest detour bulletin issued by the Highway Division, may be summarized as follows:

Through Routes.

N. Y. 2 (Painted Post to Rochester)—Bath to Kanona, one-way traffic; Wayland to Conesus, closed, detour posted.

N. Y. 17 (Liberty Highway)—Monroe, caution; Chester to Goshen, delay; Middletown to Bloomingburg, delay; Wurtsboro to Monticello, delay; Deposit to McClure, delay; Binghamton to Vestal, widening pavement; Lowman to Chemung, steam shovel grading; Vandalia to Salamanca, work in progress.

U. S. 11 (Rouse's Point to Binghamton)—Mooers to Champlain, closed; Evans Mills to Antwerp, closed.

U. S. 20 (Pittsfield, Mass., to Pennsylvania State Line)—Brainerd to Schodack Centre, caution; West Winfield to Bridgewater, 5½ miles, delays; Pompey to Lafayette, closed; Cazenovia to Skaneateles, dirt road, detour through Syracuse to Auburn.

N. Y. 5 (Albany to Buffalo)—Scotia to Hoffman, caution; east of Camillus, closed; west of Auburn, grade crossing elimination, detour; Batavia to Pembroke, closed, use Road 33 into Buffalo.

N. Y. 3 (Plattsburg to Niagara Falls)—Fine to Harrisville, detour through South Edwards; Wawbeek to Saranac Lake, dirt; Maple View to Mexico, closed, detour by way of New Haven on county roads; Red Creek to Wollcott, closed, detour on county roads.

Finger Lakes Region.

U. S. 11 (Binghamton to Syracuse)—Homer, bridge construction.

N. Y. 12 (Binghamton to Utica)—North Norwich to Earlville, open, with slight delays to traffic; best route, left-hand fork at North Norwich to Sherburne on county road.

N. Y. 13 (Elmira to Cazenovia)—Newfield to Ithaca, closed, detour posted; Varna, caution; Truxton to Cuyler, delay at bridge construction.

N. Y. 14 (Elmira to Geneva)—Montour Falls, south, 2 miles, road open, shoulders soft, caution.

N. Y. 15 (Owego to Rochester)—Trumansburg to Interlaken, construction, slight delays; Phelps, west, grade crossing elimination; Victor, east, bridge construction, delay, Bushnell's Basin to Pittsford, closed, use county roads.

N. Y. 34 (Ithaca to Auburn)—Ithaca, north, closed, detour on 34-A; Fleming, south, detour through Scipio on Road 34-B; Auburn to Weedsport, closed, use Road 5 to Sennett, for Weedsport.

Adirondacks.

N. Y. 47 (Lake George to Hague)—Bolton Landing, north, rough; avoid if possible.

N. Y. 73 (Schroon Lake to Ticonderoga)—Paradox Lake to Ticonderoga, caution, traffic maintained.

N. Y. 10 (Indian Lake to Tupper Lake)—Indian Lake to Cedar River, caution for 2½ miles; narrow road to Tupper Lake.

N. Y. 86 (Saranac Lake to Jay)—Lake Placid to Wilmington, caution.

Thousand Islands.

U. S. 11 (Watertown to Gouverneur)—Evans Mills to Antwerp, closed, detour through Theresa on county roads.

N. Y. 68 (Canton to Ogdensburg)—Closed for 8 miles north from Canton, detour posted; Pierrepont to Canton, closed during day, open at night.

N. Y. 12 (Watertown to Clayton)—Depauville to Clayton, closed, detour posted.

Catskills.

N. Y. 55 (Highland to Kerhonkson)—Gardiner to Kerhonkson, delay; Grahamsville to Curry, delay.

Direct Route to Long Beach.

THE McNeil Avenue extension, between Lawrence and Far Rockaway, was opened to traffic last week. The new concrete roadway is a mile long and forty feet wide, and part of it is constructed over a creek in the vicinity of the Far Rockaway Inlet.

The new highway opens up a direct route to Long Beach and the Rockaways from the Jamaica-Rockaway Turnpike. Motorists from New York, Bronx or Brooklyn, driving through Jamaica may make a left turn at the Turnpike and continue along McNeil Avenue across Central Avenue to Broadway. At the Broadway intersection the new roadway leads to Beach Second Street, where a short left turn leads to the new Atlantic Bridge to Long Beach. A right turn at Broadway or Central Avenue takes the motorist to the Rockaways.

Studying Highway Problems.

REDUCED cost of city paving and standardization of street and traffic practices are being studied by the city officials' division of the American Road Builders' Association preparatory to the twenty-eighth annual convention and road show to be held by that organization in St. Louis next January.

Five general committees are undertaking a survey of twenty leading cities through personal study by investigators. The general subjects will be: administration, organization and financing of highways; design and construction; maintenance and traffic problems.

Lights on Channel Drive.

TWO traffic lights have been installed at the Sixty-seventh and Sixty-ninth Street intersections of the Beach Channel Drive, in Arverne, L. I. Both streets lead to the main Rockaway Beach Boulevard, and motorists from Edgemere and Far Rockaway use these routes to get to the Jamaica Bay causeway. They are the only lights on the six-mile Channel Drive.

Crossing Victory Bridge.

AS a means of relieving traffic congestion over the Victory Bridge, Trenton, N. J., the State Traffic Commission has agreed to establish three lanes of travel for northbound motorists on Sundays and holidays. Inspectors will be stationed at strategic points to direct motorists into the lanes and guide them into Smith Street, South Amboy, which is the entrance to the so-called short route to North Jersey points.

In New England.

A SUMMARY of construction projects presently under way along trunk highways in New England, together with suggestions in regard to routings, has been supplied by the Socony Touring Service. Conditions are outlined as follows:

Massachusetts.

ROUTE 2—Construction for 2.5 miles through Orange and for .3 miles in Athol; traffic maintained without serious delays; completion expected Sept. 1.

ROUTE 3—Assinippi to Hanover, work in progress on new location; no interference with traffic.

U. S. 6—Sagamore to Sandwich, construction over new right of way; traffic follows old road which is in good condition. Road being widened from East Dennis to Orleans; traffic maintained under good conditions with only slight delay; through traffic Barnstable to Provincetown has longer optional route via Yarmouth, South Yarmouth and Chatham.

U. S. 20—Springfield to Westfield, construction complete. Work in progress for about 4.5 miles through Chester; conditions fair with slight delays; completion expected Sept. 1. Construction starting between East Lee and Bonny Rigg Four Corners is on new location and offers no interference with traffic at the present time.

New Hampshire.

U. S. 1—Pavement construction at several points between the Massachusetts line and Portsmouth; traffic maintained with the usual delays; through traffic advised to avoid this work by using Route 1A via Rye Beach or by going through Exeter.

U. S. 2—Gravel resurfacing in Bowman and Jefferson; traffic maintained without great inconvenience.

Vermont.

U. S. 2—Concrete being laid over three-mile section west from the junction of U. S. 7; one-way traffic maintained under rough conditions; through traffic Montreal to Burlington advised to use the route via St. John and St. Albans or follow route along New York side of Lake Champlain (via Rouse's Point, Plattsburg and Ausable Chasm) and ferry to Burlington.

U. S. 2-5—Concrete construction for several miles between Wells River and East Barnet, with conditions poor; through traffic St. Johnsbury to Wells River advised to follow detour, which is posted over fair earth and gravel roads via Danville, Peacham and Groton.

U. S. 4—Foundation work and gravel resurfacing for seven miles over Mendon Mountain east of Rutland; no serious interference with traffic.

Maine.

U. S. 1—Short sections of concrete being laid at Yarmouth, Brunswick, Woolwich and Thomaston; traffic maintained or good detours provided; through traffic from Bangor to Portland has good optional route of approximately the same mileage by way of Augusta, Lewiston and Pittsfield.

U. S. 2—Dixfield to Wilton, construction under way for six miles, with conditions poor; through traffic advised to detour over State roads via Brettuns Mills. Carmel to Hermon, four miles under construction; traffic proceeds over work and takes short local detour; conditions fair.

As there is construction work now going on along other local routes in New England, travelers are advised to make inquiries before proceeding through unfamiliar territory.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS MOVE TO INTENSIFY OVERSEAS ACTIVITY

TWO automobile officials expressed last week the determination of the industry to recapture its position in the overseas markets, by revising present methods and intensifying its efforts in that direction.

Before sailing for Europe last Wednesday for a two-months' stay, James D. Mooney, vice president of General Motors Corporation, said:

"The time for the intensive rebuilding or recultivation of overseas markets for American goods is at hand. American exporters face the hardest task in the history of our foreign trade, which was to be expected in view of the economic and political factors at work during the past year.

"America is in hot and growing competition with several other nations. We are in a position where we must go forth with tact and fairness to do what we can to rebuild confidence in the intentions of the United States.

"As to automotive exports—I believe there soon will be a slow trend upward."

Robert C. Graham, vice president of the Graham-Paige Motors Corporation and chairman of the export committee of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, declared that, "fully aware of the importance of the export business," the automobile industry was presently endeavoring through the Chamber to solve current problems and revise practices in an effort to expand the foreign field.

"There has been during the last nine months a recession in the purchasing power of people throughout the world due to the drop in the prices of primary products," he added, "but the gradual disposal of stocks of cars overseas is making for a healthy condition and warrants a more promising outlook in the export markets."

FINDS 509% TAX INCREASE DURING TEN-YEAR PERIOD

IN the period from 1921 to 1930 the annual tax levy on the car owners of the country has increased 509.3 per cent, according to a statement issued by the New York Automobile Club, unit of the American Automobile Association. In the corresponding period, it is pointed out, car registration in the United States increased 153.3 per cent and expenditures on highways 50.9 per cent.

Comparative figures are given as follows: In 1929 there was collected a total of $779,479,997 from gasoline taxes and license fees, as compared with $127,860,765 in 1921; last year the total motor vehicle registration was 26,501,443, as compared with 10,463,295 in 1921; and the total road expenditures for 1929 were $1,500,000,000, as compared with $994,103,567 in 1921.

SAYS MERCHANTS RECEIVE 26% OF TOURIST BUSINESS

OUT of every dollar spent by the tourists of the country, 26 cents goes directly to the merchants, it is estimated by the New York Automobile Club. This means that of the $4,000,000,000 expended by the nation's motor caravan each year, more than $1,000,000,000 goes into the tills of merchants and shopkeepers—"affording striking proof of the beneficial effect of travel on the economic life of the nation."

A MOTOR BOAT JAUNT TO LONG ISLAND'S TIP

Ten-Day Cruise Takes the Yachtsman to Shelter Island, Peconic Bay, Greenport and Sag Harbor

By JAMES KIRSHNER.

THOSE who followed the brief itinerary in these columns last week, covering a week-end cruise to Lloyd's Harbor, including visits to Cold Spring Harbor, Oyster Bay, Hempstead Harbor and Manhasset Bay, may extend their voyage by pushing on to Shelter Island, near the entrance to Long Island Sound.

This trip is admirably suited for a ten-day vacation. Equipped with Government Chart 1212 and Local Charts 298 and 299, the mariner will leave Lloyd's Harbor and head into the Sound, rounding Eaton's Point. Leaving Black Buoy 13 on the right, the course will lie due east toward Old Field Point, approximately thirteen miles off.

This is the first open stretch; the only place along here to put in for shelter is either the Nissequogue River at Smithtown, or Stony Brook Harbor. Rounding Old Field Point and keeping at least one mile off shore, a short run of about three miles brings the ship between the jetties of the breakwater protecting Port Jefferson Harbor, which includes a branch leading into Setauket, a little village founded in 1651.

Port Jefferson is a typical New England town and quite a shipbuilding centre. A steamboat line plies between it and Bridgeport, Conn. The shore here rises abruptly to heights of from 100 to 250 feet.

The next leg of the trip is a run of about twenty-five miles to Mattituck Inlet, course E. S. E. There is quite a swift tide in this inlet; with heavy north or west winds a bad sea is likely to be encountered going in. The novice had better pick a calm day for this, as for the next portion of the trip. Two jetties, the westerly one marked with a light at night, show the entrance to this inlet, which can also be recognized by a break in the otherwise unindented shore line.

The course is next set for Horton's Point Light, about seven miles distant. Compass should read E. N. E., and it is well to keep at least one mile out. The shore can then be followed to Buoy 3 off Orient Shoal, keeping outside of this buoy. The distance is about seven miles from Horton's Point. In traversing the five miles from Orient Shoal to Orient Point Light, in Plum Gut, it would pay to be familiar with tide conditions, as the tide hereabout has a velocity of about four miles an hour, and more if helped by the wind. An incoming tide against a heavy northwester, or an ebb tide against a stiff southeaster, is apt to make the going pretty rough in Plum Gut.

This strait is the passage from Long Island Sound into Gardiners Bay, and in going through from Long Island Sound the Orient Point Light should be left about 500 yards to the right. Rounding Orient Point Light leads one into Gardiners Bay, the next light being Long Beach Point, about five and one-half miles from Orient Light.

Orient Harbor affords the yachtsman a safe anchorage, with an opportunity to take the dinghy and row out to Long Beach Point for a swim. There are good accommodations at Orient; a day's respite may be taken here.

Carefully following the chart, a run of about four miles leads to Greenport. The northeast part of Greenport Harbor has a jetty protecting it, marked by a light on its end. Greenport is a picturesque old town, famous alike for its shipbuilding industry and its oyster business. All kinds of supplies and provisions can be purchased at the water's edge.

Derring Harbor, in Shelter Island, is about one and one-half miles across the bay from Greenport, and constitutes a safe anchorage and rendezvous for visiting yachtsmen. Many boatmen before proceeding into Peconic Bay turn off to visit Sag Harbor. This town was once one of the foremost whaling ports of the country. Its principal industry today is less romantic—the manufacture of watch-cases. Some time may also be spent in Peconic Bay, where there is good fishing to replenish the ship's larder. The village of Southold, in Little Peconic Bay, dates back to 1640.

Weather and tide conditions, particularly in Plum Gut, should be ideal before attempting the long return run. The trip to Shelter Island from Lloyd's Harbor may be roughly figured as eighty miles each way, exclusive of side trips to Sag Harbor, the Peconics and other points.

IN THE FOREIGN FIELD

Calls Opel Outlook Bright—Poland Acts to Improve Bus Service—Car Preferences Abroad

ALTHOUGH the balance sheet for 1929 of the Adam Opel Company of Rüsselsheim (controlled by General Motors), recently made public in Germany, shows an operating loss of 2,290,000 marks (worth 23.8 cents apiece), it is pointed out by the Berlin Vorwärts that examination of the figures reveals a very favorable financial situation. In fact, it looks as if the Opel concern had been able to cover the bulk of the cost of a general overhauling of its plant and trying out of new models out of current profits. In this connection the Berlin paper remarks:

"While the legal reserve was reduced by the demonstrated loss to 1,690,000 marks, the reserves for future depreciation allowances and possible losses were increased by 3,500,000 to a total of 14,750,000 marks. In 1929 new investments in the plant amounted to 8,250,000 marks, without any loans. And the process of transformation apparently is not over yet. In 1929 the company's debts were reduced by 15,000,000 to a total of 20,000,000 marks; apparently out of current profits, for no new credits were asked. Meantime, the obligations have been cut by 6,000,000 marks more, so that the Opel Company's status is exceedingly liquid.

"The only reason for the balance sheet showing a loss was the immediate turning back of large profits into the business. It is plain that the technical reconstruction is being financed entirely out of earnings. After this is completed the management will have a concern almost free from debt and the current earnings now being plowed under will be large enough to allow the payment of big dividends. Consequently, the management faces the future with confidence."

To Concentrate Polish Buses.

WITH a view of improving the service of the numerous autobus lines in Poland by concentration and by a possible linking up with the State railroads, the road-building department of the Ministry of Public Works is collecting detailed information about the functioning of the some 4,000 buses in operation in that republic. It is reported thus far that the ownership of about 3,200 of these buses is divided among some 2,000 individuals and that they carried 64,000,000 passengers last year. Most of the lines are short, only 129 of them extending more than 100 kilometers.

Foreign Preferences.

AMERICAN automobile manufacturers are more and more coming to realize that in their foreign business it pays to cater as much as possible to the individual preferences of different markets, according to George F. Viault of the United States Commerce Department's Automotive Division.

In a bulletin recently issued, Mr. Viault points out that preferences in the matter of construction, equipment and color vary widely in different parts of the world. The popularity of the closed car has steadily grown, he shows, although in tropical countries the open model is still favored. Bright colors are particularly desired and the plated trimmings of present-day models give them added attraction to foreign buyers. Battery ignition is now almost in universal demand, but in some few countries where servicing is difficult the magneto is still generally used.

In most foreign markets the road clearance of American cars is satisfactory, but in hilly countries or those where road construction is not far advanced the tendency toward low clearance is not welcomed.

An important item which American manufacturers should consider is the use of the metric system in many foreign markets. In automobiles destined for such countries it is manifestly important that the speedometer should register in kilometers. In several countries, notably Great Britain, its dominions and colonies, the rule of the road is to the left, and the preference is always for right-hand drive cars.

In hot moist countries leather upholstery is desirable as it is considered cooler, and fabric deteriorates rapidly, a fact which is particularly true of open cars. In connection with the color of cars for export, it is pointed out that green should not be used in cars to be sold in Persia and Arabia, as it is considered sacred, and dark red or maroon is reserved in Japan for members of the Imperial family.

Racing a La Crab.

ACCORDING to a report in the Pester Lloyd of a recent automobile competition in Rustchuk, Bulgaria, the feature event was a "backward race," in which the contenders drove their machines ten times around the track in reverse. The winning car was a little Fiat, handled by M. Belomoysky. Second and third places were also taken by Fiats, which thus furnished convincing proof of their flexibility.

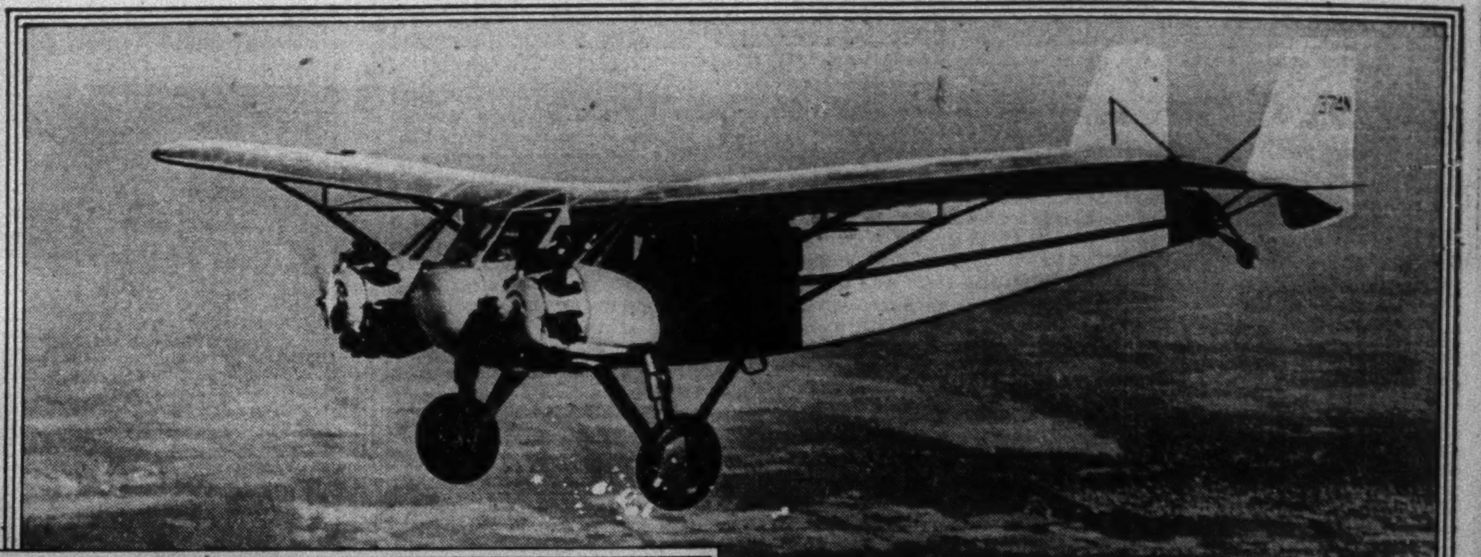
Czechoslovakian Imports.

DIE WAHRHEIT, Czechoslovakia's leading economic weekly, confirms the report that prominent Czechoslovak automobile manufacturers are visiting Paris to agree with the French on the fixing of new custom duties on automobiles. At present the Czech autonomous duties on French automobiles of 1,000 kilos are 20 crowns per kilo according to weight, while France desires a weight duty of 8 crowns per kilo. It is believed that Czechoslovakia and France will finally agree on a weight duty of 12 crowns per kilo. This low duty shall be applied on a contingent of 400 to 500 cars. However, above this number, autonomous duties shall be imposed.

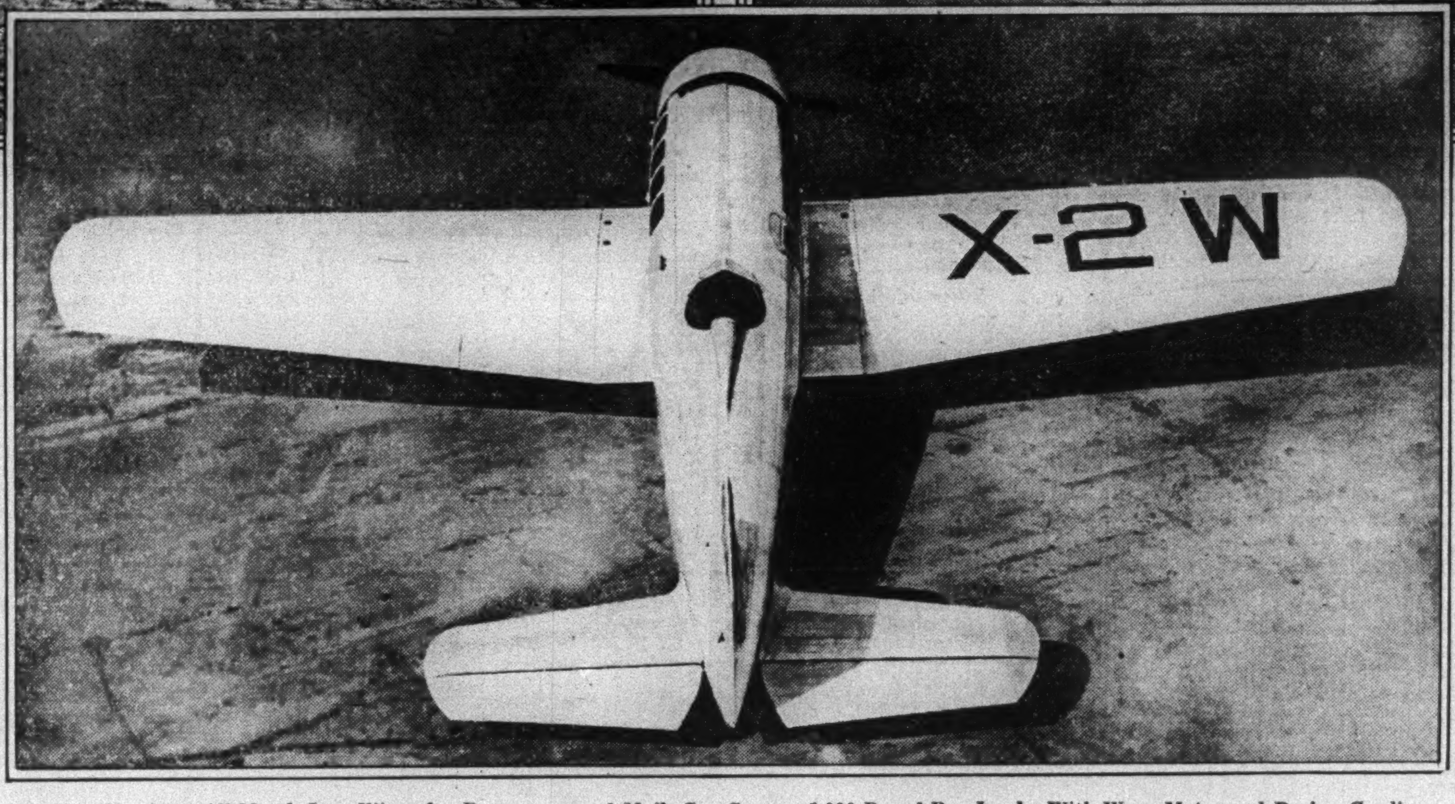
The whole measure is directed against the import of American and German cars, but those of Italy, Austria and England will not be affected. In the last year 500 cars were imported from Italy into Czechoslovakia, 140 from Austria, 140 from England and 327 from France.

NATIONAL AIR RACES WILL OPEN AT CHICAGO THIS WEEK

With Passenger Capacity for Ten Passengers Plus Mail Load of 500 to 1,000 Pounds Carried in the Base of the Lift Struts Near the Wheel "Pants," the New Bellanca Airbus Gives Maximum Payload With Single Motor, Which May Be Conqueror, Cyclone or Hornet.



Entered in the National Air Races at Chicago Is the Curtiss Kingbird, an Interesting Type of Intermediary Transport, Powered With Two Wright Whirlwind 300-Horsepower Motors. It Has Places for Eight Persons, Including Dual Control Pilot Seats.



The New Northrop All-Metal, Low Wing, for Passengers and Mail, Can Carry a 1,000-Pound Pay Load. With Wasp Motor and Boeing Cowling. It Has a Top Speed of 168, Cruising of 140 and Landing Speed of 55 Miles an Hour. It Features New Methods of Machine Construction.

NEW TRAFFIC CONTROL FOR PLANES AT RACES

Safety System Worked Out to Govern Landings and Take-Offs of Visitors—Foreign Flyers Entered

By LAUREN D. LYMAN.

NEXT Saturday at the Curtiss-Wright-Reynolds Airport in Chicago the National Air Races for 1930 will get under way. The greatest annual flying event in the United States has been a success from the standpoint of entertainment for the last three years, and this year advance notices indicate that the races will attract more people and offer a greater variety of flying than ever before.

The National Air Races had a difficult time of it after the World War. Flying was then a military affair and the world was sick of military affairs. In 1927, following the transoceanic flights, Spokane discovered that crowds would go to air races for the first time in their history.

Pessimists prophesied the next year, when the races were held in Los Angeles, that the promoters would overreach themselves, and for the first day or two, except for the splendid displays by the army and navy, there was little to attract the crowds and they stayed away. Then the contestants in the transcontinental derbies began to show up and interest revived with these great national cross-country races. Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh volunteered to take the place of a fallen comrade in the army stunt team, and his presence gave the added touch that put the races over.

Last year at Cleveland, Colonel Lindbergh joined the navy for the period of the races and flew in the High Hat trio picked from the battle fleet squadrons. The Los Angeles added its great drawing power and, to cap the climax, along came the Graf Zeppelin rolling home from its world cruise. Crowds of 50,000 spectators became ordinary at Cleveland.

Many Derbies Scheduled.

Now the races have come around again. As at Los Angeles and Cleveland, Clifford Henderson is acting as impresario. Although the location of Chicago, like that of Cleveland, destroys some of the glamour of a transcontinental derby, there are seven of these cross-country races and among them two women's derbies and one non-stop derby from Los Angeles to Chicago.

At Cleveland the women's derby proved to be one of the greatest attractions. Starting from Los Angeles, the girls flew a zigzag course across the country, were entertained each evening at a dinner sponsored by civic organizations and arrived in Cleveland fed up on fried chicken, flying and committees of welcome.

The races this year will follow a similar procedure. The race committee, for the sake of safety, has limited the days' jumps to a few hundred miles. The course for the Western race extends along the border and into Mexico and swings north through Oklahoma, Kansas, Iowa and Wisconsin—not the shortest route to Chicago, but one which will provide plenty of racing.

This race is for the higher powered craft, although Amelia Earhart, Elinor Smith, Ruth Nichols and one or two other able fliers have announced that the 200 horsepower limit will prevent them from entering. Another women's race, called the Dixie Derby, starts from Washington, swings across the Southern tier to the Mississippi and then turns north to Chicago.

Women Have Free-for-All.

Six closed course events for women have been scheduled and among them is a free-for-all, a fifty-mile race for unlimited planes. Mrs. Robert R. McCormick, whose husband, Colonel McCormick, is chairman of the National Air Races Committee this year, has donated a trophy for the women's free-for-all and about $2,500 in prizes have been promised for this event.

The Thompson Trophy race, for $10,000 in prizes and a silver trophy offered to be contested for annually by Charles E. Thompson of Cleveland, will take the place of the free-for-all for men, which was won last year for the first time by a commercial pilot against the crack military fliers. Neither the army nor the navy has entered this race this year but there will be entries enough. A number of oil companies have financed the building of extremely fast ships. Mattie Laird of Chicago has built a special plane for this race, and it is expected that Major James H. Doolittle and Captain Frank Hawks, the one employed by Shell and the other by Texaco, will fight it out in their whirlwind-powered Travelair monoplanes in this event.

A number of famous foreign pilots will be present for the international stunting exhibitions and it is hoped that they will enter their planes for the Thompson Trophy. The sponsor has invited the whole world to compete in the hope of establishing for land planes something like the Schneider Cup.

Certainly the pilots will be present. Lieutenant Alford J. Williams landed yesterday from a tour of Europe and brought with him Flight Lieutenant R. L. R. Atcherley of the Royal Air Force; Marcel Doret, representing France; Pietro Columbo, crack Italian military flier, Loese of Germany and several other pilots from Europe. Doret will fly a Dewoitine, a French pursuit monoplane with a great performance record.

Foreign Fliers to Stunt.

These international fliers are the guests of the National Air Races and James Talbot, chairman of the board of Western Air Express and Richfield Oil, who guaranteed their expenses. Out at Garden City a special plane which Williams purchased before going abroad is being set up for him. The foreign fliers will have their planes assembled at the Curtiss Airport at Valley Stream, and led by the former navy star this international stunt squadron will fly to Chicago to appear daily during the races.

The Curtiss Wright-Reynolds Airport, leased from the Curtiss-Wright Airports Corporation for the period of the races, is a new field lying on the flat prairie northwest of Chicago and directly west of Evanston at Glencoe. It is one of the best fields in the country and was described by Wing Commander Charles Kingsford-Smith, who landed [illegible] in the Southern Cross, as the [illegible] airport he had seen on his world cruise. Special road and air traffic regulations have been made for the duration of the races, and Major R. W. Schroeder, contest director, has worked out a sky traffic control system whereby ten minutes at the beginning of every hour and half hour has been allotted for landings and take-offs of planes not in the contests for the moment.

The Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce has approved the system and Colonel Clarence M. Young, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics, has ordered the regulations sent out through the country. They follow:

"Aircraft shall not be flown at any height over the Curtiss-Wright-Reynolds Airport, Chicago, Ill., nor within 1,000 feet horizontally thereof, except such aircraft as are participating in events specifically scheduled by the authorities in charge of the national air races, or as otherwise provided therein.

"For the purpose of avoiding confusion and to facilitate the landing and take-off of aircraft at the said Curtiss-Wright-Reynolds Airport, the following special signals will govern:

"(a) The airport is declared open when the signal panel on the ground near the pylon and finish line located at the south side of the airport shows white with the word 'Open' painted thereon, and the red neon light on the south portion of the roof of the large hangar is unlighted.

"(b) The airport is declared closed when the signal panel on the ground near the pylon and finish line as above described shows orange with the word 'Closed' painted thereon, and red neon light on the south portion of the roof of large hangar is lighted.

1,000 Foot Safety Zone.

"When the airport is declared open aircraft proposing to land shall approach from the southeast and effect a landing. In the event the airport is closed aircraft proposing to land shall approach from the southeast and make large circular turns to the left in the southeast area at least 1,000 feet horizontally from the boundary of the airport at a minimum altitude of 1,000 feet until the airport is declared open, at which time they may then effect a landing.

"Upon completion of the landing roll, all pilots shall observe the traffic officer stationed in the immediate vicinity of the pylon and receive instructions for further movements of the aircraft upon the airport. Take-offs may be made only when the airport is open and so indicated by the signals as above described."

26 PLANES BUSY IN SURVEY WORK IN CANADIAN PROVINCES THIS YEAR

TWENTY-SIX Royal Canadian Air Force airplanes, working in thirteen detachments, are now engaged throughout Canada in aerial photography and surveying for the government.

For several years Canada has been a leader in the work of taking photographs from the air for map-making and in making aerial surveys of large areas of practically unexplored territory. This year's program of such work has the world's largest aerial photography fleet on the task. Before the end of the season probably at least another 100,000 square miles of country will be recorded on photographic negatives.

As in recent years, the Forest Service of Canada will continue to carry on the work of forest fire protection in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for the season of 1930, and for this purpose has arranged to continue the cooperative arrangements which it has had in the past with the Royal Canadian Air Force. In these three Provinces the area over which the air patrol work is carried on approximates 100,000,000 acres, of which a large portion is unmapped. For this purpose twenty-one seaplanes and flying boats will operate to detect and suppress forest fire outbreaks. These machines will be capable of carrying greater loads than in other years, and their better performance should add greatly to the efficiency of fire-fighting operations.

Of the thirteen detachments engaged in aerial photography and surveying, one is operating in British Columbia, one in Alberta, four in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, the Northwest Territories, four in Ontario and Quebec, one in the Maritime Provinces, one has been assigned to special transportation work such as carrying surveyers, explorers and other officials into inacessible regions, and another to the exploration and photography of the main aerial routes in the Far North. The experience of the last few years has shown that at least for many years aerial transportation will be almost the sole means of communication throughout these vast and little known areas. The exploration of safe flying routes is, therefore, regarded as one of the first considerations toward opening up this country.

"CONTACT"

By REGINALD M. CLEVELAND

THANKS to aviation the world shrinks almost every week. On Wednesday, before the sun set, Captain Frank M. Hawks set down the wheels of his Travelair Mystery plane, Texico 13, at Curtiss Airport, Valley Stream, 12 hours, 25 minutes and 3 seconds after taking off at Glendale, Cal. Of this time 46 minutes was consumed in refueling during the three stops. What a winging across the far-flung continent! And as the record maker himself said, he was just cruising, not attempting to push his super-charged, 300 horsepower Wright motor to its limits, but flying at a throttle setting for maximum efficiency. His splendid flight clearly blazed a trail for a pony express of the skies, making possible the delivery of securities, for example, from the Pacific cities to New York with the loss of but a single interest day. Thus flashing propeller and stream-lined fuselage have touched with the magic of the machine age the saga of Buffalo Bill and that band of express riders who made records on gallant horseflesh across a continent of a more primitive day.

Another world shrinkage is soon to go into effect when a service involving the White Star and Cunard Steamship Lines and Imperial Airways gets under way. By means of it packages transportable by air will be carried by liner, boat train and plane from New York to Karachi in India in fourteen days.

THERE was no lack of noted spokesmen for the essentially international character of aviation at the session of the Institute of Politics devoted to "National Air Policies" last week. An earnest plea for freedom of the skies by Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, in which he amplified his recent memorandum to the League of Nations conference, was endorsed and elaborated by authorities representing Great Britain, France, Germany and Japan, as well as by Major Clarence M. Young, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics, and E. P. Warner, the navy's former Secretary for Air.

A particularly sweeping suggestion was made by Otto Merkel, director of the Lufthansa, who advocated a preferential tariff for commerce carried by air. Mr. Warner pointed out the need for a single convention covering the diverse and, at present, highly confusing air regulations and urged the pooling of international effort in such fields as South America. The truth which has been reiterated in these columns that the era of hero pilot was at an end, in so far as commercial aviation was concerned, was rather vividly expressed by Yusuke Tsurmuri, a former member of the Japanese Diet. Speaking of accidents in Japanese flying, he said he felt that they were due to the fact that "pilots placed too much dependence on the Samurai spirit and too little on scientific knowledge."

STRANGE bedfellows indeed are the under-sea depths and the flying machine. Yet they are wedded in two different ways. Last week a diver, four miles off the coast at Venice, Cal., told the passengers cruising high overhead in a T. A. T.-Maddux plane of the marine wonders he was seeing. A radio hook-up gave this strange two-way conversation to a listening country. Meanwhile the navy is constructing a flying boat for submarine use. It will be of a folding type with detachable wings and will be housed in a tank below the deck of the diving craft. To hatch this strange bird the submarine will rise to the surface of the water, wait while the wings are put on and then submerge, leaving the flying boat afloat. To regain its mother craft the plane will climb a ramp on the partly submerged after-deck and, the wings detached again, re-enter its tank.

A SORT of international beau geste marks the utilization of power for the world's largest airplane and the world's largest airship respectively. While the navy insists that it will use only Maybach motors, which have proved their worth in the Graf Zeppelin, for the gigantic United States airship Akron, now building, Dr. Claude Dornier has expressed himself as delighted with the performance of the American Curtiss Conqueror water-cooled motors which he installed on the DO-X and successfully tested last week. The change to these engines has stepped up the total horsepower of the great flying boat from 6,000 to 7,500.

MILITARY MEN FAVOR AIR REFUELING FLIGHTS

See Value in Extension of Range for Speedy Types From Slower Nurses—Method an Outgrowth of War

THE refueling record has climbed in the last two years from hours into weeks and bids fair to stretch into months as long as dealers in oil, gasoline and other commodities necessary for such a project are willing to stand the gaff. While in some respects these refueling flights resemble flag-pole sitting, tree-sitting and dance marathons, they have their constructive side.

Engine builders point to the manner in which engines keep turning day after day without a single omission in explosions as definite proof that engine failures are caused not by mechanical weaknesses, but by error in servicing or operating them. There is a certain amount of logic in this, but an engine turning just fast enough to hold a plane aloft on a duration flight is doing much less work than an engine hauling a plane through the air with load on a set schedule.

The Army Air Corps is interested for an entirely different reason. As a matter of fact the whole theory of refueling in flight is a military conception. A military man and an aviator, so far as the records show, thought of refueling to fill a definite need and holds basic patents on the idea. This man is Major Alexander de Seversky of the United States Air Corps Reserve, president of the Seversky Aero Corporation of New York and an engineer and inventor as well as a pilot.

It is more than fourteen years since Major de Seversky went to work on his refueling idea. As a pilot in the Imperial Russian Air Force during the World War he had flown heavy, slow bombers unprotected by scouts out over the Baltic and the Gulf of Riga. These bombers were at a distinct disadvantage against enemy aircraft as they approached the shore because they could not carry a protective squadron of fighters with them on their missions. The fighters did not have the range.

"I thought then that if we could find some way of refueling our fighters in the air then we could have the protection we needed for our bombers," de Seversky recalls. "One day when flying a pursuit plane with a bomber that had an aerial I closed up and reached out with my hand and seized the weight dangling from the antennae. It was simple enough and I knew that two planes could make contact with a flexible rubber hose.

"I then presented my arguments to the chiefs of the air service. The plan is simple. Just cut down the bomb load, fill extra tanks with gasoline and carry a refueling hose. Then the bombers can act as mother ships to their guardian fighters and refuel them when their tanks are empty, adding tremendously to their effectiveness and range and insuring protection for the bomber throughout the mission."

Question Mark Started Records.

Major de Seversky patented his idea in this country, and while working on bombsights for the Army Air Corps, he sold the idea in Washington. The first tangible result was the record-breaking 150-hour flight of the army Question Mark over Los Angeles in the Winter of 1928-29. Then refueling duration records began following one another all over the country.

Last Summer a Whirlwind-powered Buhl flew from Seattle to San Francisco and then across the Rockies and plains to New York and return without landing; the longest non-stop flight ever made in an airplane; a distance of about 8,000 miles with perfectly coordinating refueling meetings along the route. A Boeing mail plane, carrying a pay load, came across the country non-stop and returned as far as Cleveland, where an oil can dropped from the feeder plane ended the flight, fortunately without injury.

Major de Seversky was prevented from carrying his idea into use during the war. During a night bombing action his plane was brought down with its bomb load intact. When it struck the bomb went with it and the Russian pilot lost a leg. He was back in the air again after many months in the hospital, wearing an artificial leg of his own design and flying as well as ever. He still flies, and within a month Mrs. de Seversky has obtained her license.

The success of the Question Mark flight has seriously interested the heads of the air corps in refueling possibilities. Major Carl Spatz, commanding the Question Mark, and Captain Ira Eaker, who also flew the plane, are both convinced of the efficiency of refueling as a regular part of military tactics. The navy also, while not actively engaged in refueling experiments, is much interested in the possibility of refueling its escort planes over water on bombing missions.

HUGE ST. HUBERT MOORING MAST WAS EFFICIENT IN HANDLING R-100

INDICATIVE of the rapid strides by which ground operations in lighter-than-air transport are progressing, the recent handling of the R-100 at St. Hubert Airdrome at Montreal gives promise of a day when huge dirigibles will be berthed, serviced, loaded and unloaded with greater speed, less expense and smaller crews than is now necessary for medium-sized steamships. Ground operations have always been a serious damper on the enthusiasm of the promoters of airship transport, and engineering problems in the task of obviating the ground crews of 300 to 400 trained men have been intricate.

The new mast at the Canadian field, however, with many novel features, built by the Canadian Government with aid from American engineers and supervision by Major H. G. Scott, who was aboard the R-100 on its westward voyage, has established several records. First among them is the complete docking of the giant dirigible in twenty-seven minutes after the first landing line was dropped. Then, through the centre of the 205-foot tower the passengers and crew were brought to earth in a twelve-passenger elevator. Afterward, through permanent lines within the tower, the ship was completely reserviced with fuel, hydrogen and other necessities.

The last two operations were elementary compared with the task of erecting the machinery which moored the great vessel in so short a time. Eliminating the twisting stresses, providing power to reel in the ship accurately and evenly despite wind gusts, and the fact that no great strain could be placed on any one point of the delicate structure of the ship, presented serious problems to the engineers.

The completed mast shows an intricacy commensurate with the problems involved. A main cable of extremely high tensile strength is mounted on a winch governed by variable, high-speed gears. Two other auxiliary cables are mounted on similar winches but no strain other than that of the side sway of the ship in the wind is to be placed on them.

As the R-100 approached the mast at 600 feet altitude, the main cable was drawn out on the ground to a white marker to leeward of the mast. The landing line was dropped from the ship as near to the marker as possible and attached to the main cable with a special coupling. The engines were shut down and the winch was carefully timed to take up all the slack without jerking the ship. Then the cable was reeled in.

When the line became taut the two auxiliary lines were attached to the sides of the forward quarters of the envelope, making the yoke to the mast in the form of a triangle. With slightly greater tension on the main cable, all three lines were reeled in together by the accurate synchronizing mechanism of the winches. The two auxiliary cables guided the ship's nose cone directly into the mooring bell, where, once fastened, all lines were cast off and reeled further in to await the next mooring operation.

The reeling was done at speed varying with the distance of the ship from the bell. The speed of the main cable varied from 150 feet to one foot a minute, slowing as the ship drew nearer to prevent momentum from causing a crash against the top of the mast.

AIR LINE IN DUTCH INDIES.

OPENING of air service between Java and Sumatra, Netherlands East Indies, has been announced for this month. Suitable landing stages for the route are being provided. Work on a field at Laboeau Roekoe is reported as completed and operations are progressing on another at Rantau Prapat. A plot of ground has been set aside for a landing field at Kota Penang. A hangar is being constructed at Medan, the terminus in Sumatra. The service is expected to be weekly, according to the Department of Commerce.

43,902 PERSONS EXAMINED FOR PILOT RATINGS IN YEAR

AVIATION is attracting the youth of the land with ever-increasing magnetism, if the records of the medical examinations for the last fiscal year which ended July 30 are an index. Examinations for pilot ratings numbered 43,902, a greater number than the total for the three previous years. In the twelvemonth 22,606 students were examined and 18,595 re-examinations were conducted by physicians for the Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce. In addition to these 2,435 persons who had been flying as unlicensed pilots were examined.

Of the list of students applying for a certificate of fitness to fly 1,435 were unable to pass. Of 12,402 pilots who were re-examined for the same grade of license they had held heretofore 100 were disqualified.

PICKING UP TWO-METER WAVES

English Experimenter Builds a Simple Radio Set in Evacuated Glass Case to Send Ultra-Short Waves Across Twelve Miles

A RADIO set built without the usual coils of wire has been developed by W. J. Brown, an English experimenter, to successfully transmit and receive signals on a wave only two meters long.

In a report to the Institute of Radio Engineers, Mr. Brown describes the novel sending and receiving outfits, with which he has operated over a distance of twelve miles. He sees important work for these ultra-short wave lengths in short-distance communication between ships at sea, between aircraft, for use in direction finding and fog-warning devices and for iceberg detection.

A pair of small power tubes of a size similar to those used in many American broadcast receivers, with their bases removed, forms the most important part of the diminutive transmitter. These tubes are linked by straight wires running from grid to grid of the tubes, plate to plate and filament to filament. The wires are tapped at the mid-points by other short wires running to the necessary A and B batteries. The straight wires form the aerial system of the transmitter. A sending key to make dots and dashes completes the circuit.

Wires Dipped in Mercury.

The receiver is similar to the transmitter, but has provision for attaching an audio amplifier to operate a loud-speaker. The wires connecting the tubes in both the transmitter and receiver are cut apart at their midpoint and the tubes mounted vertically so that the severed wires can be dipped into U-shaped glass tubes filled with mercury. By causing the wires to be immersed deeply the waves generated by the system are less in length. By drawing the wires part way out of the mercury the wave length is increased. This is accomplished with a threaded bolt and nut, which acts as a tuning dial for the sending and receiving equipment. In the U-shaped sets small extra pieces of wire one meter in length (39.37 inches) are attached to serve as antennae.

Attempts made to increase the power of the sending station to more than about five watts met with disastrous difficulties at first because the high-frequency currents would not readily pass through the wires leading through the glass envelopes of the tubes. To overcome this difficulty the transmitter is placed in an evacuated glass case. This enables the use of 100 watts.

Tests Made in Wales.

"Preliminary tests indicated that a range of the order of several miles was to be expected, and a series of tests was therefore carried out along the coast of North Wales," said Mr. Brown. "This coast was chosen for the experiments, since it comprises a number of wide bays across which signals can be transmitted with the intervention of land. The possible applications of the system are principally for maritime purposes, so the tests simulated the working conditions which would be encountered in practice. The complete transmitter and antenna were mounted on a seven-foot vertical ash pole. Power supply was taken from a generator mounted on an automobile. Supply for the filaments was taken from the car starter battery. The receiver was carried around in another automobile.

"The procedure was to erect the transmitter at some convenient point on the coast and explore the signal strength with the portable receiver. The signal strength varied considerably with the height of the sets above the intervening country or sea.

"When the transmitter was moved to a part of the coast where high cliffs prevail and installed atop a point 400 feet above sea level the signals were intercepted with great strength. Tests were made with a portable parabolic reflector to determine the improvement in signal strength and the degree to which the signal could be reduced in unwanted directions. The reflector comprised fifty aluminum wires, each one meter in length, suspended vertically around the circumference of the parabola.

Waves Enter Steel Buildings.

"With the transmitter installed at ground level in an open courtyard near the centre of a city, reception was carried on with the automobile receiver in the city streets up to a distance of a mile. At this distance the signal strength varied greatly according to whether the street in which the receiver was located ran with or across the line of transmission, overhead wires of street car systems sometimes weakening and sometimes strengthening the signals. Under street railroad bridges a distinct shadow was cast. With the transmitter on the roof of a fifty-foot building near the city centre reception could be obtained almost without interruption for two miles through the streets. Contrary to popular belief, it was not necessary that the transmitter be visible from the receiver. Reception could be carried out on the inside of sheet-steel structures, where receiving might be expected to be impossible because of the screening effect."

Mr. Brown predicts, after comparing his results with those attained by engineers experimenting on five, seven, ten and twenty meters, that the range of the two-meter waves can be "determined at will." For instance, if it is desired to transmit only over distances of ten miles the transmitting set's power and height above the earth can be adjusted to values which will give this range. In this case, Mr. Brown said, it will be practically certain that the signal cannot be picked up outside of a circle of twenty to thirty miles radius around the transmitting station, and its elevation above sea level. To produce a concentrated beam of radio energy on two meters a reflector system of "several wave lengths in width and possibly in height" must be used. With such a reflector and transmitter adjusted for ten-mile work it practically assures secrecy except at much shorter distances in the other directions.

An Aid to Secrecy.

By sending out a certain type of two-meter wave and employing a super-regenerative receiver the advantage of secret communication is attained, Mr. Brown said, except when similar receivers are used and adjusted simultaneously to the two waves sent out. This allows a large number of messages to be sent out simultaneously on the same transmitter, one on each different modulation frequency. Mr. Brown visualizes his two-meter sending set and its antenna about a yard long "slung at the top of a mast, the same principle being adopted for reception," with a pair of wires carried below to the radio room ashore or afloat, or in aircraft, to which are attached either a sending key or a loud-speaker.

Commercial Applications.

Mr. Brown lists the possible commercial applications of his diminutive senders and receivers as follows: Signaling between neighboring stations, or a fog-signaling system such as a continuous warning sent out by every ship, with receivers for the location of other ship warnings, all on the same wave but using different modulation frequencies. Directional loop receivers to determine the location of vessels in fog; directional transmitters constructed to revolve and send out signals at known directions at certain times; directional transmitters aboard ship to send out certain types of signals ahead, astern or abeam of vessels so equipped, and thus help to prevent collisions; iceberg detection by observation of beams reflected back to an observer from the sides of the berg, and for television image sending over limited distances. A special robust type of self-contained sender was developed inside brass cylinders, the cylinders themselves acting as the antenna.

LEGISLATORS ESTABLISH NEW RECORD FOR APPEARANCES BEFORE MICROPHONE

WITH the closing of the Seventy-first Congress a new record has been established in the broadcasting of speeches on legislation before the House and Senate. More than 100 addresses in explanation of and for and against pending measures have been put on the air.

Records in Washington show that every important piece of legislation was discussed at length by members of the two houses of Congress. Through radio the voices of more than one-third of the members of the Senate and more than fifty members of the House were heard by the people of the United States.

In addition, government officials, headed by the President, made greater use of broadcasting in reporting to the people the Federal Government's activities. President Hoover, virtually every Cabinet member and more than a score of other high government officials appeared before the microphone.

Among other subjects discussed were civil service, census, elections, income tax, national defense, national parks, peace, Philippine independence, reclamation, flood prevention, food and drug administration, education, aviation and business.

During 1929 the National Broadcasting Company contributed 290 hours of time to the discussion of governmental activities. For the first six months of 1930 more than 200 hours of time have been used for such purposes on the company's networks. This is an increase of more than 50 per cent.

During the six months 239 government officials and legislators made a total of 439 addresses. President Hoover established a new record, speaking eleven times. Vice President Curtis spoke once, Secretary of Agriculture Hyde three times, Secretary of Labor Davis, Secretary of the Interior Wilbur and Secretary of Commerce Lamont twice, and Secretary of State Stimson and Secretary of War Hurley once.

The Department of Agriculture was the greatest user of radio time during the period. One hundred and fifty-one officials of the department appeared before the microphone a total of 328 times.

Ten Outstanding Events This Week

Aug. 17-23

(Time Is P. M., Eastern Daylight Saving.)

TODAY

8:30—Goldman Band Concert; Del Staigers, Cornetist—WJZ's Network. (Also on Wednesday, 8:45 P. M., Over WNYC.)

9:15—Pasternack's Orchestra; Elliott Shaw, Baritone—WEAF's Network.

TUESDAY

8:30—Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Lewisohn Stadium, Willem van Hoogstraten, Conductor; Hall-Johnson Choir—WOR.

WEDNESDAY

8:30—Symphony Orchestra; Edna Kellogg, Soprano—WEAF's Network.

9:30—Orchestral Concert; Revelers Male Quartet; Soloists—WEAF's Network.

THURSDAY

8:30—Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Lewisohn Stadium, Willem van Hoogstraten, Conductor—WOR.

10:00—Concert Orchestra; Wilfred Glenn, Bass; Ohman and Arden, Piano Duo—WEAFs Network.

FRIDAY

8:00—Orchestral Concert; Cavaliers Quartet; Jessica Dragonette, Soprano—WEAF's Network.

SATURDAY

2:30—Description of National Women's Tennis Finals, Forest Hills—WABC's Network.

8:30—Goldman Band Concert; Del Staigers ,Cornetist—WJZ's Network.

LISTENING-IN

LISTENERS during September will have an opportunity to tune in on a variety of sporting events such as no other month during the course of the year offers. Beginning with the Harmsworth speedboat trophy races on the Detroit River on Sept. 2, and running right through to the opening of the football season, practically every field of sports will be represented over the air waves.

Following the Detroit races the national professional golf finals at the Fresh Meadow Country Club links at Flushing, L. I., will fill the air on Sept. 5. Microphones will be installed in the stadium of the West Side Tennis Club, at Forest Hills, L. I., on Sept. 12-13, for a description of semi-final and final matches of the men's national tennis championship.

Before the dust has settled on the courts announcers will rush to Newport for one of the greatest sporting events of the year, the race for the defense of America's Cup against Sir Thomas Lipton's challenging yacht, Shamrock V. If sailing weather is good the first race will be run on Sept. 13. On Monday, Sept. 15, the Shamrock V and the American defender will spread their sails over a different course and the races will continue until Saturday, Sept. 20, or until one of the yachts has won four out of seven events. Rules provide that each race will start shortly after 10:30 A. M., and if neither yacht crosses the finish line in less than five and a half hours, the race must be repeated. WABC, WEAF and WJZ and combined networks will receive reports of the progress of this marine classic.

Wedged in somewhere between these dates will be another new experiment in sports broadcasts. For the first time in radio history listeners will hear the hoofs of the polo ponies carrying Captain Tommy Hitchcock and three other high-goal internationalists in their defense of the historic Westchester Cup against the invading English mallet-wielders at Meadowbrook, L. I. The date for this match has not yet been selected.

Before this exciting program is well over the first big football games will be under way and the world series baseball championship will claim its place in the radio calendar. Pity the poor sports fan who has no radio set!

Amos n' Andy Signed.

Amos 'n' Andy have proved so popular with the radio fans that the National Broadcasting Company as their exclusive agents have signed a long-term contract for their services with the toothpaste manufacturers who sponsor the broadcasts. The contract is said to call for a salary on a sliding scale over a period of five years netting them the largest amount ever paid to radio entertainers. In addition to their salary the program sponsors paid them a substantial bonus this year. It was on Aug. 19, 1929, that Amos 'n' Andy made their début over a wide NBC network under the sponsorship of the toothpaste concern. At the time, although they were well known to listeners throughout the Middle West, they were newcomers to network broadcasting. Within a short time, however, they won millions of followers and national acclaim.

When the structure which is to house New York's largest hostelry is opened to the public it will increase the potential radio listening public of Manhattan by at least 2,000 people.

The new Waldorf-Astoria centralized radio receiving and public address system will be installed at an approximate cost of $200,000, and will contain about 1,000,000 feet of wire. Each of the public rooms of the hotel will be equipped with at least one large exponential horn loud-speaker concealed in the walls or ceiling. In the main ballroom a battery of speakers will be arranged on an elevating platform inside the grill work, which is to conceal the pipes of one of the largest organs of the country. When the organ is being played the loud-speakers will be elevated so the tones of the various organ pipes will float out from the grill work without interference. When the large speakers are in operation the platform will be lowered before the grill. The speakers are of sufficient power to be heard great distances, according to Western Electric engineers, who are doing the installation work.

The Television Band.

There are but four channels available for experimental television work and these are fully occupied by twenty licensees, sharing time. The Federal Radio Commission does not consider television as an art to be used for entertainment at present.

Sam Herman, xylophonist, is heard on an average of fifteen programs each week, either over WEAF or WJZ's network.

Lindbergh's Speech Preserved.

Radio listeners in foreign countries, who because of atmospheric interference were unable to hear Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh's address on aviation broadcast on Aug. 8, will be permitted to hear the sound of his voice through the agency of phonograph recordings prepared for shipment to various networks of the world as souvenirs. Recordings carrying the entire address, introductory remarks by the local radio announcer and incidental music are about to begin the journey from New York to England, Germany, France, Sweden, Australia and New Zealand. In addition, records of the talk are to be presented to noted aviators and friends of the flier, and to various networks of this country.

Records of the address, intercepted via the broadcasting stations which carried the address on Aug. 8 and recorded by another process, have already been dispatched to England and are due to arrive at London in time for broadcasting today over the chain of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Thus has been preserved for posterity Colonel Lindbergh's first address prepared specifically for radio presentation upon a topic about which he is eminently able to comment.

WHEN RADIO ROLLS LIKE SURF

Engineers Explain Strange Effect That Mystifies American Listeners Who Tune In on the Rebroadcasts From London

AMERICAN radio listeners have been mystified by the peculiar fading and surf-like sound of the London voices rebroadcast in this country after crossing the ocean on short waves. This strange effect, as a listener described it, sounds like "a giant surf breaking on a rocky cliff." It changes a speaker's voice in a fraction of a second's time from the high, distinct characteristics of a tenor to that of a rumbling bass. Music, deep and sonorous one minute, may be swiftly changed to tones which are high and shrill.

For a long time this peculiarity of speech and music when transmitted over long distances by radio has literally had many radio engineers guessing. After months of testing with a special transmitter located at Deal Beach, N. J., and a receiver at New Southgate, near London, England, the engineers have arrived at the conclusion that "selective fading" is the cause of the trouble. They say that the earth's magnetic field, which causes the mariners' compass to assume a general north and south position, also may, at different times of the day, literally cause the speeding radio waves to turn somersaults.

The engineers have discovered facts which lead them to believe that only on rare occasions do any two tones of the human voice or a musical instrument, when transformed into radio energy, travel the same path in the ether between widely separated transmitting and receiving stations.

Although the transoceanic tests were carried out chiefly on the short waves, the engineers point out that the same surf-effect and tone distortion may be heard frequently by auditors while intercepting the program of a distant broadcasting station. When projected into space the low tones of the voice, or the bass notes of a 'cello, may skip off the "radio-roof" at entirely different places.

Considerable Distortion.

However, it has been found that a considerable amount of distortion in the "voice or music patterns" may be present without any serious effect on the intelligibility of the radio telephony. The changes occur often with great rapidity. First the low tones will be deficient in signal strength, or entirely absent, then the fading will be evident in the middle tones, then at the high tones. Obviously, when fading is greatest on the low tones, a voice will sound "harsh and tinny." When the high tones are lost in the radio transmission the voice will sound "booming and drummy." It is the same with music.

A study of the "transmission characteristics of a short-wave telephone circuit," made by R. K. Potter, engineer of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and his associates, in cooperation with A. G. Jensen, who is in charge of the receiving equipment at New Southgate, has been reported before the Institute of Radio Engineers. The apparatus used to generate the signal observed in England was located at the Walker Street terminal of the telephone company. A "multitone" sender was used to generate electrical vibrations ranging in frequency from about 400 to 2,000 cycles per second in steps 200 cycles apart. These currents were carried by wire to the Deal Beach station. All the tones were sent out on the radio waves one after the other in regular succession, by means of a special motor-driven rotory switching device. This device, together with a similar one at the receiving station, made it possible to send and receive complete tone-patterns at the rate of about 150 per second. A New Southgate a cathode-ray oscillograph attached to the short-wave receiver made it possible to rapidly record the tone patterns in the form of visible and vertical lines of light, the heighth of which indicates the strength of the various tones broadcast from this country.

By recording a great number of the groups of vertical lines at regular intervals the engineers detected that the fading progressed in an orderly manner from the low to the high frequencies, or vice versa. It was the first time that the effect of atmospheric conditions on the radio waves could be watched closely as the changes occur. At times the fading occurred at a high rate of speed. During certain times of the day and year, however, the changes in signal strength occurs more slowly. One effect noted was that the words often were distorted when fading was greatest, and the voice became high-pitched and thin.

"When distortion is present," said Mr. Potter, "it may result in the voice becoming low-pitched and gutteral at one moment and high-pitched a moment later. This type of distortion is due to a partial suppression of certain fundamental frequencies in the voice."

Dr. Potter's Conclusion.

In his summary of results obtained Mr. Potter said that except in unusual cases of transmission across the Atlantic it is necessary to assume that the radio waves are following three or more paths to account for the "pattern shapes and the sequence of changes observed," and that this is particularly true of long waves. The waves may travel through different levels of the Heaviside surface or "radio-roof," which is normally between 100 and 300 miles above the earth. If the high frequencies of the human voice travel over the longest route they will naturally arrive at the receiver later than the low tones and distortion results. If the low tones are drowned out entirely the voice will be shrill. If the high tones are lost in the ionized surface above the earth the voice will be drummy.

Most of the time the "selective fading" is not serious and the persons speaking over the transatlantic telephone are not aware that anything is happening to change the sound of their voices. But engineers are still at work on the problems, many of which are yet unsolved. They hope to find ways, some day, of overcoming all the peculiar effects inflicted by nature on radio telephony over long distances. The surf-like sounds which frequently mar the programs rebroadcast in this country after crossing the ocean on short waves are caused by the automatic volume control apparatus used at the American receiving stations. When the transoceanic signals fade the automatic volume control device makes the receiver more or less sensitive to meet the deficiencies of the radio energy. The rushing or surf sounds are waves of local noise amplified and made audible by the receiver.

RADIO ENGINEERS MEET IN TORONTO FOR FIRST INTERNATIONAL CONCLAVE

THE communication world is focusing its attention upon Toronto, where the first international convention of the Institute of Radio Engineers will open tomorrow. Various phases of the communication art will be analyzed during this four-day conclave, covering new developments and problems and the solutions reached by radio engineers in the various research laboratories.

At the opening session I. J. Kaar, General Electric Company, and C. J. Burnside of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company will read a paper on the developments in high power broadcast transmitters. The matter of high power for broadcast stations has been a controversial subject before the commission for some time, and considerable interest centres around this subject. Dr. R. W. Boyle of the National Research Laboratory, Ottawa, Canada, will lecture on "Ultra-Sonics." O. B. Hanson of the National Broadcasting Company will present a paper on "Design Acoustics of Broadcast Studios." R. W. Armstrong of Westinghouse is scheduled to speak on "Polyphase Rectification Special Connections." Dr. A. N. Goldsmith, vice president and chief engineer of RCA Photophone will deliver a paper on "Sound Recording and Reproduction for Sound Motion Pictures." A. Ringel of the same organization will discuss "Efficiency of Loud-Speakers."

G. W. Kenrick and R. A. de Mars of Tufts College, and G. W. Pickard, Wireless Specialty Apparatus Company, will reveal their investigations of radio transmission phenomena.

Other engineers contributing papers are B. deF. Bayly, University of Toronto; Keith Henney, Electronics Magazine; R. M. Page and W. F. Curtis of the Naval Research Laboratory; G. C. Southworth, American Telephone and Telegraph Company; a paper on aviation communication by J. S. Richardson of the Northern Electric Company; Ross Gunn, Naval Research Laboratory; J. D. Miner, Westinghous Electric Company, and H. C. Roters and H. L. Paulding, Stevens Institute of Technology. An important session of the convention will be a symposium on international communications. Colonel A. G. Lee of the British General Postoffice staff; Lloyd Espenschied of American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and W. Wilson of the Bell Laboratories; A. A. Isbell, RCA Communications; Hobart Mason, Western Union Telegraph Company, and H. H. Buttner of the International Telephone and Telegraph Company will be represented at the Tuesday session.

On Wednesday papers will be presented by W. D. Loughlin, Radio Frequency Laboratories; W. A. MacDonald and H. A Wheeler, Hazeltine Service Corporation, and K. L. Scott, Western Electric Company. The Engineering Division of the Radio Manufacturers' Association has been invited to participate in the activities of the convention. An exhibition of radio parts used in the manufacture of radio receivers and transmitters will be on display on the mezzanine floor of the King Edward Hotel, which is the convention headquarters.

JUNIOR BASEBALL SERIES ON THE RADIO NEXT WEEK

When the American Legion Junior baseball series begins on Aug. 28 at Memphis an extensive network of stations covering the country will carry a word-picture of the contests to radio listeners. Each broadcast period is expected to begin about 4:30 P. M., Eastern Daylight Time, and last for two hours. WJZ will be the New York outlet. The team winning two games will be adjudged the junior champions. The series will continue until victory has been achieved by one of the teams.

THE MICROPHONE WILL PRESENT

Hall-Johnson Choir to Be Heard With Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra—Other Broadcast Events

TWO compositions by contemporary composers will be played by the Roxy Symphony Orchestra over WJZ's system at 2 o'clock this afternoon. They are the "Enigma Variations" by Sir Edward Elgar and "To the First Cuckoo of Spring" by Frederic Delius. The latter work is one of the composer's best efforts and one of the neglected pieces of real value. Delius, like Elgar, was born in England and developed an individual style in spite of having to overcome the handicap of almost total blindness.

Addresses by Governor Frank G. Allen of Massachusetts, Mayor James M. Curley of Boston and Martin H. Carmody, Supreme Knight of the Knights of Columbus, and oratorios by the K. of C. Choral Society will be heard when the K. of C. convention is broadcast from Boston over WABC's network at 5 o'clock this afternoon. Details of the program follow:

Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff
Adagio non troppo, from Symphony No. 2 in D ....Johannes Brahms
Andante cantabile, from String Quartet, Op. II (orchestrated for strings),
Peter I. Tchaikovsky
Allegretto scherzando from Symphony No. 8 in F ....Ludwig van Beethoven
Serenade (Barlow arrangement),
Franz Schubert
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Richard Wagner
Minuet from Arlesienne, suite No. 1,
Georges Bizet
"Espana" Rhapsody ......Emanuel Chabrier

Thursday, Aug. 21.

The Philharmonic Symphony concert to be broadcast over WOR from the Lewisohn Stadium, under the direction of Willem van Hoogstraten, at 8:30 o'clock Thursday night, comprises the following selections:

Symphony No. 8 in G minor........Bruckner
Intermission.
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"......Wagner
Air for strings, from Suite No. 3.......Bach
Excerpts from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz

The melodies of Schubert, played in special arrangement by a concert orchestra under the direction of Nathaniel Shilkret, will be heard during the broadcast over WEAF's network Thursday night at 10 o'clock.

The program also will include a half-hour program of dance music by a guest orchestra, which, on this occasion, will be the band of Ohman and Arden. Frank Black will conduct and vocal refrains will be sung by Frank Luther.

Mardi Gras, Concert Orchestra; Danny Deever, bass solo, Wilfred Glenn; Soliloquy, Concert Orchestra; Daniel in the Lion's Den, bass solo, Wilfred Glenn; Negro Dance from Three Sketches, Concert Orchestra; Strike Up the Band, Soon, Why, Dancing the Devil Away, I Love You So Much, Ro-Ro-Rolling Along, Out of Breath, I'm Only Human, Should I? Ohman and Arden and orchestra; Moment Musical, German Dances, orchestra; Erlkoenig, bass solo, Wilfred Glenn; Rosamunde, Vienna Waltzes, Marche Militaire, orchestra.

Friday, Aug. 22.

Jessica Dragonette, soprano, will return to the air after an absence of several weeks when she will be heard as soloist in the concert under Nathaniel Shilkret's direction at 8 o'clock Friday night. WEAF will do the high frequency oscillating.

Serenade ....Tosselli
Soprano solo, Jessica Dragonette.
Dance Bagatelle........Bourdon
Orchestra.
Medley of Popular Tunes—
Get Happy.
Moon Is Low.
My Future Just Passed.
Cavaliers.
Out of Breath, from "Garrick Gaieties," Miller
Orchestra.
Once in a Lifetime, from "Vanities"..Green
Soprano and baritone duet, Jessica Dragonette and John Seagle.
Mood in Blue........Pollock-Shilkret
Orchestra.
Selections from "Show Boat"........Kern
Orchestra, Jessica Dragonette, soprano and Cavaliers.
Manhattan Moonlight........Alter
Orchestra.
In Memory of You........Burke
Tenor solo, Leo O'Rourke.
Sketches of Popular Songs—
Piano duet, Frank Banta and Milton Rottenberg.
Little White Lies........Cavaliers
Indian Love Call, from "Rose Marie"..Friml
Soprano solo, Jessica Dragonette.
Sing, from "Forward March"......Johnson
Orchestra.
A Perfect Day........Bond
Orchestra, Jessica Dragonette, soprano, and Cavaliers.

Philip James, director of the Little Symphony concerts, has engaged Charles Miller, violinist, as the solo artist for Friday's program, which begins at 8 o'clock over WOR.

Zehn Maedchen und kein Mann Overture.Suppe
(Ten Maidens and No Man).
Suite for orchestra from Sigurd Jorsalfar, Grieg
Vorspiel—Intermezzo, "Borghild's Dream," Huldigungsmarsch
Violin solo........Charles Miller
Serenade, Opus 7........Richard Strauss
Cat and Mice........Leonard-Herbert
The Irish Washerwoman........Leo Sowerby
Violin solo........Charles Miller
Suite, "La Feria"........Lacome

Saturday, Aug. 23.

A play-by-play description of the women's national tennis finals at Forest Hills, L. I., will be brought to listeners in tune with WABC and allied stations from 2:30 to 5:30 o'clock Saturday afternoon. The preliminaries will be described in fifteen-minute summaries on the four days prior to the final matches.

The Salon Singers, a mixed chorus, will be featured with the orchestra directed by Cesare Sodero in the concert to be heard through WEAF's network Saturday night at 8 o'clock.

Overture to "Der Freischutz"....von Weber
Orchestra.
Still as the Night........Bohm
Mixed chorus.
Minuetto ....Haydn
Orchestra.
Killarney ....Balfe
Mixed chorus.
Capriccio Italienne........Tchaikovsky
Orchestra.
Allah's Holiday........Friml
Women's octet.
At the Dance........Coates
Orchestra.
Finale, from "The Gondoliers"......Sullivan
Male octet.
Shepherd's Hey!........Grainger
Orchestra.
Legend of the Chimes, from "Robin Hood," de Koven
The Homecoming........Coleridge-Taylor
Orchestra.

The closing concert of the season from the campus of New York University will be played by the Goldman Band over WJZ's network at 8:30 o'clock Saturday night:

March—"Tannhaeuser" ....Wagner
Overture—"Rienzi" ....Wagner
Ave Maria........Bach-Gounod
Choral and Fugue........Bach
Overture—"Mignon" ....Thomas
Fantasie Brilliante........Bellstedt
Del Staigers, cornetist.
Finale—Fourth Symphony........Tchaikovsky
Second Hungarian Rhapsody........Liszt

NOTES ON THE MUSICAL BROADCASTS

By BENJAMIN GROSBAYNE.

SIR EDWARD ELGAR'S "Enigma" variations and Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" are to be played by the the Roxy Symphony Orchestra under Jos.ph Littau this afternoon at 2 o'clock over WJZ.

Frederich, originally, Fritz Delius, offers one of the most unusual instances of international training in musical history. Born in Bradford, England, in 1863, of German parents, he was first prepared for a business career. When he was 20 he was sent to an orange plantation in Florida. He studied composition himself so well that he taught music two years later in Danville, Va. Then he spent two years at the Leipzig Conservatory under Jadassohn and Reinicke. During this period he and Grieg became great friends which never ceased and was broken only by the death of the Norwegian composer. Since 1888 Delius has lived in Paris and Grez-sur-Loing.

A few years ago he was made a Companion of Honor in England, rather belatedly. Last October, under the baton of Sir Thomas Beecham, who organized the festival, and called Delius "the most important composer since Wagner," six concerts of the composer's most representative life's works were given Delius, in his sixty-eighth year, paralyzed and blind, made the journey in a wheel chair to be present. The enthusiasm of the audience deeply affected the composer who has been living in France for thirty years.

"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" was played last January by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and at the Stadium Concert on July 16. It was composed in 1911-12 and was the second of two compositions for small orchestra, the first being, "Summer Night on the River." Percy Grainger wrote the following notes when the piece was first heard in this country in November, 1915.

"The Norwegian tune on which this work is founded is 'In Ola-Valley the Church-Chimes Ring' which Grieg has used also. Delius adores Norway and spent eighteen Summers there in the high hills of Jotunheim. The advent of Spring therefore brings him longings for Norway."

The first melody is said to be Delius's own and we hear the clarinet give the distant cuckoo calls. The second melody is the folk-tune. The music begins slowly in six beat and in C. The violins have the theme early. The score calls simply for flute, oboe, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns and strings playing more than one part in each section.

It is music of a Spring evening, liquid, fluid and limpid.

The Tale of the Robot.

Paul Dukas's (Paris, 1865–) "Scherzo," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is included on the program to be broadcast over WOR Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Willem van Hoogstraten.

Dukas, like his countrymen Saint-Saëns and Ravel, is another one of those modern Frenchmen who have an almost diabolical cleverness in orchestration. He is also a brilliant critic.

A scherzo, in Italian, means joke, jest, foolery, pleasantry, fun and raillery, and this music is all of this. There is, in addition, definitely dramatic touches required by the story. The music is founded upon Goethe's ballad, "The Magician's Apprentice," and goes back to the Greek satirist, Lucian. The wizard Pancrates, pupil of Iris in music, has a disciple, one Eucrates, so the ancient writer tells us in his dialogue, "The Lie–Fancier." Eucrates relates that he accompanied his master to an inn and saw the magician take a broom or any piece of wood, clothe it and pronounce a formula. At once the broom went out, fetched water, got the people food and kept going until the robot became a broom again by another magical formula.

Eucrates learned every other trick from his master but this one, though he tried to worm it out on every opportunity and by every artifice. One day he overheard his master pronounce the charm—a simple one of only three syllables. The next day the pupil, while his master was away, repeated the formula and ordered the clothed broom to bring a pitcher of water, which it did immediately.

Here is where the trouble began. The unfortunate apprentice did not know how to say the remainder of the incantation, with the result that the clothed broom kept bringing more and more and still more water. He became panic-stricken and split the broom with an axe, only to find both parts bringing water, a sort of Cerberus, whose heads multiplied when one was cut off. The place was almost flooded and the would-be sorcerer almost drowned before the master returned and set matters aright with a few words.

The rhythm shows the sweeping of the broom unmistakably and the volume of the tone the climax. Note the droll bassoon.

An Industrious Genius.

Anton Bruckner's (Ansfelden, Austria, 1824-Vienna, 1896) Eighth symphony in C minor will be part of the program broadcast over WOR by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra Thursday at 8:30 o'clock under Willem van Hoogstraten.

The music of Bruckner is typical of the man, and an understanding of it makes an acquaintance with the facts, if not the details of his life, almost imperative. He was the oldest of twelve children and spent a childhood in the direst poverty. All his life the clothes and manners of his youthful environment never left him, and to many he seemed like an apparition of the proverbial absent-minded and carelessly attired genius to whom everything was of importance except those matters directly relating to and concerned with the earth on which he lived.

He studied first with his father and when the latter died he attended the famous abbey of St. Florian, with its noted 75,000-volume library, to which he paid little, if any, attention, and the celebrated four-manual organ, with its eighty speaking stops. Late in life he tried pathetically to study physics and mathematics, but his mind always remained in one track. His soul never had more than one window.

Whether or not his lack of academic training was responsible for the lack of form in his music can never be proved. This formlessness and lack of direction, this unwinding of themes when close packing was absolutely necessary, were all in large measure responsible for the many years of obscurity before his music finally made him famous, though he composed a piano piece at thirteen.

He was abnormally industrious. He often practiced ten hours on the piano and three on the organ in one day. He taught. He played fiddle, organ and piano to eke out a bare existence. In the town of Windhag, boasting of 400 souls, where he first taught, he was put down as crazy. Of course, the town is hysterically proud to claim him now. He soon went to another town, Steyr, and so grew to love it that his last wish was that he be buried in the churchyard there or under the St. Florian organ.

In this Eighth symphony a huge orchestra is called for. Woodwinds and brasses in three, full percussion and eight horns share with three harps and full strings. Though he prayed to be allowed to finish his "Ninth," as did Beethoven, he was called before the finale.

Blood and Sand.

The Spanish suite "La Feria," by Paul Lacome (1838-1920), the French composer of a formidable list of popular songs, suites and operettas, is included on the program to be played over WOR Friday night at 8 o'clock by the Bamberger Little Symphony under Philip James.

"La Feria" (The Fair) is in three parts. "Los Toros" (The Bulls) is a three-beat, rapid sort of tango rhythm for full orchestra in festive spirit. It recalls "La Paloma" after eighteen measures. The second theme, characteristic and sentimental, still maintains the sharp tango accompaniment, and the strings suggest guitars. The first and second themes are then repeated.

"La Reja" (the serenade at the window balustrade) is light and cheerful and almost suggests a barcarolle in its six-eighth time. The flute sings the melody with the strings furnishing a distinct and detached accompaniment. The 'cellos and basses play an answering melody to the flute as if there were a dialogue between a man and a woman. When the flute picks up the serenade once more the accompaniment changes and becomes flowing and suave. In the final measures the brass and woodwind enter full force in a pompous finish as if the lover was putting his best foot forward.

The last movement, "La Zarzuela," is a brilliant and spirited waltz for the full orchestra.

The "zarzuela" is a kind of national and traditional native form of entertainment in Spain which has some connection with our own opera and also vaudeville turns. Music and declamation alternate.

The second theme is for trumpet (or cornet) with soft string background. The violins, flute, various woodwinds and finally the brass bring the sparkling suite to a close.

It is to be noted that the Spanish waltz, though in three-beat rhythm, is not played like its Viennese relative, which steals from the second beat making the third seem always a bit late. The Spanish, and for that matter, the South Americans, have a tendency to lengthen the first beat of their dances, while the Americans like strict rhythm. All this makes for charming national distinctions and variety in the same dance.

A GOOD ANTENNA WIRE IS THE RECEIVER'S EAR

Location an Important Factor—How to Erect It So the Set Will "Hear" Whispers in Space

A GOOD antenna is a vital factor in radio reception. Too many radio listeners in a hurry to have their new sets go on the air neglect the antenna, according to radio manufacturers. The antenna is to the radio set as the ear is to the brain. The ear eavesdrops on sound. The antenna eavesdrops on the ether.

"There is no simple method of predetermining antenna performances in cities," said F. X. Rettenmeyer, chief engineer of Fada Radio, "because of 'dead spots' and wave reflections caused by metal structures. It frequently happens that ground connection or power line connection may give exceptional results in some parts of cities when used as the antenna, while well-constructed antennae may be disappointing. This condition is usually reversed in rural districts.

"For general reception, the straight single horizontal wire has been found best when placed in a position as free as possible from other wires and metal structures, and, where possible, installed at right angles to all other wires," said Mr. Rettenmeyer. "This generally means at right angles to the nearest street or vertical. Never cross over or under power or trolley wires with the antenna structure and always use an approved lightning arrester correctly installed.

Straight Wire Found Best.

"For best signal strength on the broadcast waves," he said, "a horizontal wire about 100 feet long and fifty feet high is generally superior. Obviously, such an antenna should be electrically shortened by a small series condenser of say .00025 to .001 microfarads to adapt it to modern receivers, except in locations remote from broadcasting stations. As a rule, both height and length must be determined by available antenna fastening facilities.

"A short antenna gives greater selectivity at reduced signal strength and, in general, less static, while a long antenna gives less selectivity, greater signal strength, with an increase in static. It makes little difference whether the antenna is indoors or out, but a metal roof, metal laths in walls, beams and columns act as shields. As a rule, antennae placed close to such things are worthless.

"It is a common error to assume that antenna performance depends on the number of feet of wire used. The best results will usually be obtained with a single horizontal wire with lead-in attached either at the centre or at one end. A zigzagging or curving antenna is to be avoided, since in most cases it will reduce rather than increase results. The lead-in wire should be of the same material as the antenna proper and should be soldered to the horizontal portion. If the lead-in wire is brought down the side of the house it should be held on insulators five or six inches from the building walls. Leave a little slack in the lead-in wire between the antenna proper and the first insulator support on the lead-in to prevent the lead-in wire snapping due to the swinging of the antenna.

The Community Antenna.

"The maze of tangled aerial wires seen on the roof and in courtyards of nearly every modern apartment house presents not only an unsightly appearance but makes for interference and poor reception. A large antenna feeding a number of radio receivers through a small series condenser (.00015 or smaller) may be reasonably satisfactory. There has recently appeared on the market an inexpensive antenna system for operating as many as fifteen radio receivers from a single antenna. The tenant on the first floor receives as well as the tenant on the top floor, and electrical interference is an absolute minimum.

"In noisy urban districts in which one receiver at a time is to be operated from the antenna it is advisable to erect the highest possible antenna with sufficient length, 60 to 200 feet flat top, to insure good signal pick-up, regardless of the length of the lead-in.

"The antenna should then be electrically shortened by inserting a series condenser, say one or two .000125 mfd. condensers in series, to permit compensation of the receiver antenna stage. Excessively strong local stations should be taken care of by the use of wave traps in the antenna circuit—one for each interfering station. These should be adjusted for the desired reception from each station. This may require that some of the wave traps be slightly detuned. Install wave traps as close as possible to the receiver. The primary on the wave trap should be connected in series with the antenna and the rotor of the wave trap condenser should be connected to ground.

"In some instances the antenna lead-in picks up considerable interference and adds very little to signal strength. In such cases the lead-in should be shielded and the shield connected solidly to ground. It frequently happens that the lead-in wire is responsible for picking up most of the interference due to its position, while the reverse is true of the top wire.

"An otherwise perfect installation will not be satisfactory unless an efficient ground is used," said Mr. Rettenmeyer. "Connecting the ground wire from the receiving set to a cold water pipe is usually best. Whenever possible the ground connections should be soldered to a cold water pipe. When this is not practical, scrape the pipe carefully with a file and sandpaper it until the metal is shining and bright. Place a piece of tinfoil around the pipe and put an approved ground clamp on top of the foil. Tighten the clamp firmly."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Time Schedule and Channels Used by KDKA's Short-Wave Transmitter—Call Is W8XK

QUESTION—When does KDKA use its short-wave transmitter? The call of the station I refer to is W8XK.—G. R. S. ANSWER—Sunday, Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 8 A. M. to 12 noon, on 19.72 meters, equivalent to 15,210 kilocycles; noon to 5 P. M. on 25.25 meters, or 11,880 kilocycles; 5 P. M. to midnight, 48.86 meters, or 6,140 kilocycles. Station KDKA's regular programs are broadcast by the short-wave station at the time mentioned.

QUESTION—I live in Chapala, Mexico, and for the last five years have been using an eight-tube battery-operated radio set using two 45-volt and three 22½-volt "B" batteries and twelve 1½-volt "A" batteries. I use seven No. 199 tubes and one No. 120. Are better bulbs being manufactured than those I have and if so which? Would the new bulbs, if any, need a different set of batteries?—C. S. ANSWER—The type and number of tubes used in your reecvier indicate that it is a well-known superheterodyne, and if so, it cannot make use of any other type of tube now on the market except the 199s and the 120 power tube.

QUESTION—I have a four-tube regenerative set and am troubled with body capacity. When I take hold of the tickler or tuner knobs the volume increases about double. I use an "A" and "B" eliminator on direct current from the light socket to operate the 199 tubes and the 120 power tube in the last stage socket. Can you suggest a remedy for this trouble?—W. T. C. ANSWER—The trouble may not be body capacity, but an unbalanced condition of the radio-frequency tube and tuner. Try reversing the wire connections to the tuning condensers. The rotor and shaft part of the variable tuning condensers should be attached to the grounded side of the circuit, while the stator parts of the condensers are attached to the grids of their respective tubes. This precaution generally eliminates body capacity. Try a new tube in turn in the radio-frequency and detector sockets. Make sure that the grid wires are as short as possible and well separated from other parts of the circuit, especially the plate wires of the set. Adjust the balancing condenser so the set does not oscillate on the lower broadcast waves and leave it in that position.

QUESTION—I have a set which plays well for about an hour, then suddenly drops in volume and sounds very tinny. This continues unless the set is turned off for about two hours. When turned on again it goes through the same procedure. Tubes are all O. K. and the set is claimed to be in perfect condition by the set makers. I have had all wiring in the house checked. Can you tell me what the trouble is?—G. F. D. ANSWER—Trouble of this character has, in many cases, been traced to one poorly soldered joint in the set's wiring or to a defective audio transformer, which may heat up gradually in operation and cause the tinny sound after an hour or so of receiving. A break in the fine wiring of the transformer secondary will prevent the "C" bias voltage from being imposed upon the grid of the following vacuum tube. If the tube happens to be one of the power type the tinny sound will be quite pronounced. In addition, the tube will burn out quickly.

QUESTION—I have a home-made set with three 199 tubes using three "A" batteries and 90 volts "B" battery, all dry. I expect to use the new No. 230 tubes in place of the 199s. Please tell me how many 2-volt batteries will be required, or if any 2-volt dry batteries are made for 230 tubes?—T. W. Mc. ANSWER—There are no 2-volt dry cells. These tubes are best suited for operation from one ordinary storage battery cell, which gives 2 volts.

QUESTION—I would like to connect earphones to my Sparton electric receiver. Having tried it I find the phones, which are 2,000 ohms in resistance, when connected to the voice coil terminals of the dynamic speaker give a sound so low as to be barely audible. At the same time the quality was not good. How can such a set of earphones be attached to give better volume? (2) On stations WNYC and WPCH reception is not perfect when the speaker is used, although all other broadcasters are quite clear cut. Why is this? H. D. S. ANSWER—The earphones should not be attached to the voice coil leads of the dynamic speaker because the voltage at that point has been stepped down to a low value by the input transformer of the speaker. The proper place is following the detector tube. A radio technician should be secured to insert a phone jack in this part of the circuit, into which the phones may be properly plugged. The use of telephones at any other part of the circuit will not result satisfactorily and might injure the receiver in time, or the phones may burn out. (2) A distant station may be causing interference to the local broadcasters. Is the antenna too long for sharp tuning?

RADIO TRADE COMMENT

An Automatic Station Finder Device for New Receivers —"Flashograph" Tuning

A RADIO receiver which tunes itself automatically to a predetermined series of broadcast programs at definite intervals throughout a twenty-four-hour period without human supervision, turning itself on and off as required, has been announced by the Rudolph Wurlitzer Manufacturing Company, makers of Lyric sets.

"The device comprises three essential elements: first, an electric motor capable of rotating the tuning condenser and capable of stopping at any one of nine preselected tuning positions; second, a time clock electrically driven, and third, a mechanism which correlates the functioning of the aforementioned units; to allow the receiver to be tuned to chosen programs at fifteen-minute intervals, throughout the twenty-four-hour day," said L. M. Shapiro, chief engineer, in describing the mechanism of the tuner.

By means of a series of small rods extending from the face of the panel, each rod corresponding to a particular time of day and covering a fifteen-minute period, the user is enabled to select the programs he desires to hear. All that is necessary to make an adjustment is to select the appropriate time rod and set it at the desired program. If the operator wishes the receiver to be shut off at a certain time the proper time rod is pulled out as far as possible. The listener may consult the radio programs for the day, make the settings for the next twenty-four hours and forget about the mechanism, Mr. Shapiro said. Other features of the receiver are automatic volume control and a tone color knob to give various shadings of the received sound. The chassis employs four screen-grid tubes in the radio-frequency amplifier and terminates in a pair of 245-power amplifier tubes. A "junior" line of seven-tube radio receivers was also announced.

The new Fada line of radio sets includes five screen-grid models; an open-face lowboy, a lowboy with sliding doors, two highboy consoles and a radio-phonograph, all featured by "flashograph" tuning. The chassis, of the nine-tube type, incorporates as its features an automatic volume control, a noise filter for minimizing local interference, the two-element detector, preselector tuning designed to prevent cross-talk or blanketing by dial operation. The sets are designed to operate from alternating current at 60 cycles, 90 to 130 volts, but models are available for 25-cycle operation.

A tuned radio-frequency license has been granted the Ware Manufacturing Corporation of 480 Lexington Avenue by the Radio Corporation of America, according to O. S. Schairer, vice president in charge of patents.

The addition of a new type of high-voltage mercury vapor rectifier tube to its line of transmitting tubes has been announced by the De Forest Radio Company of Passaic, N. J. The rectifier is of the "hot-cathode" variety and is rated at 20,000 volts maximum potential operation. The transmitting tubes now made by this concern range in size from a 15-watt oscillator to a 5,000-watt high-power water-cooled audion.

free wheeling could have saved America Four Hundred Million Dollars gasoline and oil expense last year

Last year, American motorists bought over 13 billion gallons of gasoline and 450 million gallons of oil.

If Free Wheeling, Studebaker's epochal contribution to motoring, had been available on all cars in 1929, 12 per cent to 20 per cent less gasoline would have been consumed, and 20 per cent less oil. And the American public would have saved at least $400,000,000 as a result.

You save gasoline and oil in the new Free Wheeling President and Commander Eights because they give you the full benefits of momentum automatically. When you have gone 10,000 miles, your engine has "worked" about 8,000 miles. Strains on engine, transmission and axle are also lessened, and tires wear longer.

Use clutch only to start or back up!

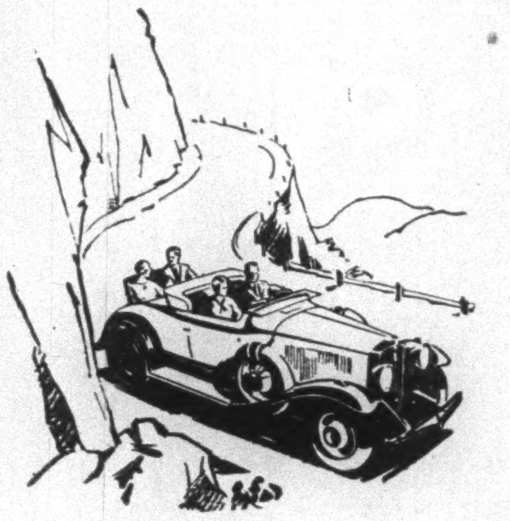
Due to Free Wheeling, you can shift from high to second, back and forth, at 40—50 miles an hour, and never touch the clutch.

There is nothing new to learn. Free Wheeling under positive gear control is simplicity itself. The braking power of your engine is available as readily as in conventional cars. You drive just as you do in a conventional car.

Free Wheeling—Plus Champion Seasoned Eight Performance

Studebaker's seasoned Eights already hold 5 world, 18 international and more American stock car records than all other makes combined. And now Studebaker adds another brilliant milestone to its 78 years of manufacturing progress by introducing Free Wheeling with positive gear control—the first manufacturer in the world to do so.

Take a new President or Commander for a trial ride and Free Wheeling will win you as no new motoring advancement has ever done. It is the motoring sensation of 1930. Arrange today for a driving appointment.



Positive Gear Control
With Free Wheeling under positive gear control, the full braking power of your engine is instantly, easily and always available in all speeds—high, second and low—for use whenever you desire it.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y., Aug. 16.—Chaffee Earl's Jim Dandy, 100-to-1 shot from sunny California, where it rarely rains, galloped through the stickiest mud Saratoga has had all season to win The Travers in a common gallop from William Woodward's Gallant Fox, three-year-old champion, and Harry Payne Whitney's Whichone today. A distant fourth finished the only other starter, Willis Sharpe Kilmer's Sun Falcon.

A few moments after the finish, when the greatest crowd this historic course has seen in years stood astounded at the result, Raymond Workman, Whichone's rider, slipped from the saddle far down the track and led his horse the long way back to the scales. Whichone had gone lame in the running, but like a true thoroughbred had finished out the mile and a quarter of the sixty-first running of The Travers.

In all the great throng of 30,000 there was only one man who professed confidence before the race that Jim Dandy would win. This was J. B. McKee, trainer of the colt which a year ago had finished like a bolt from the blue to win the Grand Union Hotel Stakes at long odds from some of the smartest horses in the East.

His finish today earned $27,050 and has left the turf world wondering what kind of a horse he is, or what is more important, what kind of a horse Gallant Fox is.

Gallant Fox 1 to 2.

The fall of a champion is always a blow, but what a blow this was may be guessed from the odds laid against the great colt that had won in succession the Wood Memorial, The Preakness, Kentucky Derby, Belmont Stakes, The Dwyer and The Arlington Classic. He was 1 to 2 in the betting despite the positive belief of Whichone's supporters that the Fox would meet his master. True enough, he did, but it was not Whichone that did the mastering.

Whether Gallant Fox was better than Whichone today still is an open question for the two ran head and head and battled each other tooth and nail until Jim Dandy sailed past on the bend and drew off and left them floundering.

A few moments later, Gallant Fox drew ahead to finish second, six lengths back of the winner, but it was just about then that Whichone's leg went back on him. Workman said after the race that it was at the three-sixteenths pole that he felt Whichone's leg give way. Gallant Fox and he were head and head there, and while neither had a chance to win, the contest between the two for the place was still an even one.

"How did Jim Dandy draw off so far from two horses like Gallant Fox and Whichone?" Workman was asked.

"They just couldn't keep up with him," the jockey replied.

Sande Presses Gallant Fox.

Earl Sande laid the bat on Gallant Fox in earnest. There was no fooling, no rousing of just a loafing horse. Sande was trying to make him run and Gallant Fox was doing his best. After the race, Sande said:

"That horse Gallant Fox doesn't like the mud."

The wise men of the turf, the trainers, handicappers, veteran owners, jockeys and in short all who know horses and horse racing are tonight seeking an explanation for the upset, which was the biggest of the season.

Many go back to the old maxim: "Anything can happen in the mud."

No one is ready to make Jim Dandy champion over Gallant Fox. It is to be remembered that in the Travers of 1928 in the same kind of mud, Reigh Count suffered his only defeat of the year. The champion 3-year-old of that season, with Mr. Whitney's Victorian as the contender, came out for the 1928 Travers. Petee-Wrack, an outsider, came along and beat them both.

Although Gallant Fox and Whichone raced head and head until well into the stretch, it cannot be said that they raced each other into defeat, for the pace was slow. The final time for the mile and a quarter was 2:08, and here are the fractions: 0:23 4-5, 0:48 4-5, 1:14 3-5, 1:41 and 2:08.

The break was in front of the grand stand in full view of the thousands who crowded to the rail. Those at luncheon, including Governor Roosevelt, were at the edge of the clubhouse and watched the four horses get off to a perfect start.

The post positions from the rail outward were Sun Falcon, Jim Dandy, Whichone and Gallant Fox. By the time the field reached the clubhouse turn Whichone and Gallant Fox were running head and head and in the van of the others.

It was clear that Workman had been given instructions to run Gallant Fox off his feet. But he Lord Burghley Wins 440-Yard Hurdles at Hamilton, Setting Canadian Record.

SIX-MILE RACE TO SAVIDAN

New Zealander Also Breaks Mark in Grind—King and Prince of Wales Send Messages.

By LINCOLN A. WERDEN.

Special to The New York Times.

HAMILTON, Ont., Aug. 16.—The flags of three countries were raised on the staff of victory at the Civic Stadium this afternoon as 15,000 spectators from various parts of the Dominion witnessed the opening events and the ceremony which started the first British Empire games, a new chapter in the sporting annals of Great Britain.

After the procession of athletes had trouped through the portals of the west gate, some 330 back of the standards of eleven countries, Canada scored the first victory in a final event when Gordon Smallacombe of Toronto won the hop, step and jump.

Soon after the final of the 220-yard dash, the Union Jack flew as a token of the triumph of 20-year-old Stanley Englehart of England, who led the Canadian champion, Johnny Fitzpatrick, by four feet and came within two-fifths of a second of the Dominion record when he covered the distance in 0:21 4-5.

Leads Team-Mates to Victory.

One of England's most popular athletes and a principal figure in the games here, Lord David Burghley, the Olympic champion, set a new Canadian record in capturing the 440-yard hurdles in 0:54 2-5, leading his two countrymen, R. Leigh-Wood, known chiefly as a quarter-miler, and D. M. L. Neame of the Royal Navy by a margin of ten yards.

Finally, in the concluding event of the day, the last of the five finals scheduled on this afternoon's program, the crowd had occasion to pay tribute to one athlete from far-off New Zealand, when John William Savidan completed a gruelling six-mile race with at least 100 yards to spare on his closest rival, Harper of England.

The performance was remarkable in that Savidan, accustomed to the grass of his native Auckland, ran in his first event on a cinder track and lowered the Canadian record of 32:58, with his time of 30:49 3-5.

Hailed on Victory Dais.

The slender, dark-haired New Zealander, 28 years old and a builder by trade, stepped to the victory dais in the centre of the stadium where Lord Burghley had appeared a few minutes earlier, and stood with right arm upraised as the New Zealand flag was raised and his country's anthem was played.

Perhaps those who dedicated the games earlier in the day could regard the results—the victories of a nobleman and a builder—as typical examples of the spirit and interest they hope will prevade these contests.

King George sent a message extolling their inception and adding "whatever may be the result, I am sure that this friendly competition cannot fail to foster a spirit of brotherhood and sportsmanship amongst all taking part in the games, for the success of which I send my best wishes."

The message was read along with one from the Prince of Wales by Premier R. B. Bennett of Canada. Premier G. Howard Ferguson of On-

Richardson, Dean of Canadian Riflemen, Captures the Governor General's Match

By The Associated Press.

OTTAWA, Ont., Aug. 16. — Major Fred Richardson of Victoria, B. C., dean of Canadian riflemen, today showed the way to 149 younger men when he won the Governor General's match, greatest event in Canadian marksmanship, with a total score of 245 points for five ranges.

Major Richardson, who stated that he was "somewhere between 60 and 70 years old," has been among the expert shots for many years, but today achieved his greatest ambition. Although he has represented Canada on the Bisley team for fifteen years, he had never before worn the crown he now wears.

Turning to the large crowd standing behind the firing line as soon as the result was known, Major Richardson said:

"I sincerely thank you for the kindness and warmth of your greetings. Naturally, I am very proud, more especially because I am now a very old man. What I would like to see and what I have always aimed at is to get more young men to prepare themselves for the defense of the empire. It is not a question of thinking of war: it is a question of preparing one's self for something in life. Show me a man who is a trained rifleman and I will show you a sober man and a good husband."

Sergeant Major E. J. Reid, Esquimalt, B. C., was only one point behind Major Richardson in the final tally.

By Major Richardson's victory a Halifax, N. S., man, C. Rogers, won nearly $25,000 in the associated members' pool, run in connection with the match. Associate members drew for their marksmen before the first stage was fired on Thursday last, and Rogers was fortunate in having the Victoria man represent him.

ENGLAND GETS 316 FOR FIVE WICKETS

Sutcliffe Stars With 138, Not Out, as Fifth Test Cricket Match Begins.

45,000 WATCH OPENING

200 Stand in Line All Night for Deciding Contest Against Australian Eleven.

LONDON, Aug. 16 (Canadian Press).—The fifth test cricket match between England and Australia began today at the Kensington Oval, and when stumps were drawn England had scored the good total of 316 runs for 5 wickets.

A remarkable innings by Herbert Sutcliffe, who scored his seventh century in Anglo-Australian matches, steadied the homeland team down and took it round the bad corners when star batsmen such as Wally Hammond, W. W. Whysall and Maurice Leyland failed. Sutcliffe set up stands first with Jack Hobbs, then with Prince Duleepsinhji and lastly with England's new captain, R. E. S. Wyatt.

Sutcliffe and Wyatt came together when five wickets had fallen for 197 runs and proceeded to punish the Australian bowling.

Sutcliffe was undefeated with 138 runs to his credit when play ceased, while Wyatt scored 39, not out.

England Bats First.

The match was opened this morning and England batted first. The game will be played to a finish. The match is the fifth of a series this season and the two countries each have a victory to their credit, while the balance of the matches have been drawn.

The weather was beautiful and the pitch in perfect condition. England won the toss. After a fair start when 71 runs were added for the first wicket, England lost Hobbs, one of her great opening pair, and Whysall, a newcomer to international cricket, for only 97 runs. Sutcliffe, who started the innings with Hobbs, played a stonewall game in the face of vicious bowling and keen fielding.

Two hundred hardy souls waited all night outside the oval for the match to begin. In the early hours of the morning thousands more lined up, and tubes, buses, tramcars and motor cars poured out constantly increasing crowds. The grounds were packed when play was resumed after lunch. It was estimated they held more than 35,000, while another 10,000 looked on over the fences.

Sutcliffe Plays Safely.

McCabe and Grimmett held the batsmen pinned down to singles for a period after tea. Wyatt hardly inspired confidence when he played to Grimmett, but Sutcliffe, while he was making few runs, played safely. Sutcliffe gave the crowd chills when he was 83. He edged an extra fast ball from wall into the gully, but McCabe, at second slip, started the wrong way and the tip traveled to the boundary past the fielder's outstretched left hand. Wyatt began to pick up a few runs in a scratchy fashion.

The teams were announced as follows:

England—R. E. S. Wyatt, Prince Duleepsinhji, I. A. R. Peebles, Jack Hobbs, H. Sutcliffe, H. Larwood, G. Duckworth, Wally Hammond, Maurice Tate, M. Leyland, W. W. Whysall, Pat Hendren, Twelfth Man.

Australia—W. M. Woodfull, A. Fairfax, A. F. Kippax, W. H. Ponsford, Don Bradman, S. McCabe, W. A. Oldfield, C. Grimmett, T. Wall, P. M. Hornibrook, A. Jackson.

Umpires—Hardstaff and Parry.

GIANTS SWEEP ON, BEATING REDS TWICE

Triumph, 9 to 1 and 3 to 2, to Approach Within One Point of Second-Place Robins.

FITZSIMMONS IN FINE FORM

Holds Losers to Five Hits in the Opener, Victors Scoring Seven Runs in First Inning.

By JOHN DREBINGER.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 16.—Sweeping on with the irresistible pressure of a high gale that threatens soon to develop into a tornado, the Giants plunged deeper into the West tonight after wrenching both ends of a double-header from the Reds here today to sweep the four-game series.

They captured the opening engagement, 9 to 1, as the chubby Freddy Fitzsimmons skilfully hurled his way to his eighth consecutive victory, and then bagged the nightcap, 3 to 2. A gathering of 10,000 Cincinnatians groaned in unison as the Reds collapsed under the two jolts, while the McGrawmen dashed on to St. Louis to seek fresh triumphs.

Only one point now separates the faltering, second-place Robins from the Giants, who, despite the continued absence of their pilot, John McGraw, have contrived to win seven of the eight games they have played thus far since embarking on their final Western jaunt of the year.

Overpowering the Reds in the second engagement, however, proved a rather nerve-trying ordeal in which Tiny Jim Chaplin had to expend the last ounce of energy in his generous frame to finish in front of Benny Frey.

Terry's Double Breaks Tie.

In the sixth, with the score deadlocked at 2-2, two well-directed shots by Freddy Lindstrom and Bill Terry sent a tally over the plate for the Giants that subsequently carried the day. Lindy's effort was a single and Terry's was a sliced drive that just shaved the left field foul line for a double, the fleet Lindstrom scoring all the way from first.

Immediately the Reds tried to stage a counter-offensive, but though in the last of the sixth they got three singles and the benefit of a hit batsman, they failed to score for the simple reason that their first hit was wiped out by a double play, and Walker, with the bases full, left them that way with a soft fly to Roettger in centre.

In the ninth the Reds strove again. Walker singled and whisked around to third on a sacrifice and an infield out. But Chaplin had just enough left to stem the rush, for though he passed Cuccinello he held the dangerous Heilmann to an infield tap to end the game.

Critz's double and Leach's single gave the Giants a run in the first inning of this game and to this they added another in the fourth on singles by Leach and Lindstrom and an out. The Reds counted twice in

VAN RYN CRUSHED BY MANGIN, 6-1, 6-1

America's No. 5 Player Loses in Eastern Turf Court Tennis Semi-Final.

SUTTER CONQUERS BELL

Gains Final by Victory at 6-4, 6-3—Baroness Levi and Miss Gladman Triumph.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

Special to The New York Times.

RYE, N. Y., Aug. 16.—Dealing out deadly execution with his electrifying forehand, Gregory Mangin of Newark and Georgetown University gained a crushing victory at 6—1, 6—1 over John Van Ryn of East Orange, fifth ranking player of the country, today in the Eastern turf court tennis championships at the Westchester Country Club.

The match was played on a sodden court and came to an end as the elements broke again this afternoon to force a postponement of the other semi-final until an hour and a half later. In this engagement Clifford Sutter of Tulane University, national intercollegiate champion, handled the chops of Berkeley Bell, 1929 holder of the title, with surprising facility on the wet turf to win in straightforward fashion at 6—4, 6—3.

Baroness Levi Scores.

The Baroness Giacomo Giorgio Levi of Rome and Miss Marjorie Gladman of the University of Southern California reached the final of the women's singles. The Baroness, making big capital of her chop strokes, whose back spin provoked error-making, defeated Miss Helen Marlowe of California at 6—0, 6—3, while Miss Gladman's beautiful back-hand carried her to victory over Miss Clara Louise Zinke of Cincinnati, 6—3, 6—3.

Miss Virginia Hilleary of Philadelphia and Miss Dorothy Andrus of Stamford and Miss Virginia Rice of Boston and Miss Zinke came through in the semi-finals of women's doubles. The former pair put out Miss Edith Cross and Miss Mianne Palfrey at 8—6, 5—7, 6—1.

Miss Rice and Miss Zinke, after being within two points of victory in the second set against Miss Gladman and Miss Josephine Cruickshank, when they led at 5—2 and 30-all, dropped five games in a row but came back in the third, which was held up for an hour by rain, to pull up from 1—4 with a run of five games. Miss Rice's volleying was the deciding factor in the victory, which was gained at 6—4, 5—7, 6—4.

The semi-finals of the men's singles were to have been decided by the best of five sets, but owing to the loss of a full day of competition on Friday it was arranged to limit it them to three sets. It is possible that had the longer route been followed Van Ryn might have staged a come back against Mangin and saved himself from defeat, for he was improving right along after an erratic performance in the early stages.

With Mangin playing as he did in the two sets, however, it was difficult to conceive of him dropping three in a row even to a Van Ryn

DETROIT R. C. WINS EIGHT-OARED TITLE

Defeats Leanders by Six Feet in the Senior Final at Canadian Henley Regatta.

SENIOR SINGLES TO WRIGHT

West Side, Buffalo, Scores in 140 and 150 Pound Senior Eights and Fours.

By The Canadian Press.

ST. CATHARINES, Ont., Aug. 16.—Oarsmen from the United States captured the lion's share of honors at the Royal Canadian Henley Regatta which closed this afternoon, including the Hanlan Memorial Trophy for senior eights, which went to Detroit.

The senior singles championship was retained by Canada when Joe Wright Jr. of Toronto won back the honors with Jack Guest, Diamond Sculls winner and last year's champion, a spectator, resting up from his strenuous work in the shell.

E. Bole of Winnipeg led in the earlier stages and almost fouled Wright. W. E. G. Gilmore, who was second to Wright, rowed the best course of all competitors and just beat John Durnan of Toronto, Argonauts, for second place by half a length. The winner's time was 8:32.

In the senior eights Hamilton Leanders led Detroit, Toronto Argonauts and Buffalo West Sides for nineteen-twentieths of the distance, outsprinting Leanders and winning by six feet at the finish. Argonauts, who were favorites, were third by nearly two lengths. The winning time was 7:04.

Halifax Captures Senior Fours.

In the senior fours final Halifax won from Lachine by about three open lengths, while Lachine was the same distance in front of Detroit. The time was 7:35.

The West Side Boat Club of Buffalo staged a strong finish to win the race for 140-pound senior eights. The Buffalo crew won by a half length from the Detroit Rowing Club, which led most of the way. The Don Rowing Club of Toronto finished third, the Leanders of Hamilton, Ont., fourth. The winning time was 7:04.

Lachine did not start. Detroit broke even with Dons, but gained a few feet in the first half mile. Leanders, later pulling away from Dons, still lacking a length on Detroit at the mile. West Sides, slightly behind from the start, here picked up, leaving Leanders and Dons and making a strong bid for first position. A quarter of a mile to go they lacked a few inches of being even with Detroit. They had half a length on Detroit at the finish.

The West Sides followed with a victory in the 150-pound senior eights event in 6:53, with the Wyandottes of Detroit second and the Lachine crew of Montreal third.

West Side Stages Final Spurt.

Lachine was slightly behind the others in the early stage of the 150-pound senior eights event. At the half-mile the Leanders fell back and the Wyandotte crew stepped into the lead. At the mile Wyandotte had a full length on West Sides. The Buffaloans started hitting 42 to the minute, catching Wyandotte 200 yards from home. Leander and Lachine were then tied for third posi-

Army Olympic Teams Not Allowed to Draw On the War Department Budget for Funds

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 16.—If the Army, as it is the desire of the War Department that it shall do, enters Army teams in the modern pentathlon and equestrian events at the Olympic Games to be held in Los Angeles in 1932, the financing of the expenses of those teams cannot be charged to the public funds.

This was the ruling made public today by Controller General John R. McCarl in answer to an inquiry by Secretary of War Hurley, who informed him that the War Department had under consideration the entering of teams for the events named.

"Participation in an athletic contest or training therefor is not required in the public service," said Mr. McCarl, "and the athletes taking part do not take part in an official capacity as officers or employes of the government.

"Travel and transportation purely and solely for athletic purposes is not within the spirit or purpose of the present appropriation act.

"In reply to your specific question I have to advise you that the appropriated funds are not available for payment of expenses incurred for travel of personnel and transportation of horses in connection with training for and actual participation of Army teams in the Olympic Games to be held in Los Angeles in 1932."

Apparently the only hope of the Army so far as the games are concerned is in Congress, which can save the situation by voting an appropriation in the army bill for the fiscal year 1932.

Woman Runs 880 in 2:18 1-5 For World Mark in England

STAMFORD BRIDGE, England, Aug. 16 (AP).—Miss G. Lunn, in winning the 880-yard run in the women's amateur athletic championships today, established what is claimed to be a new world record of 2 minutes 18 1-5 seconds for the distance. She defeated Miss R. Christmas of London by eight yards.

No official record for 880 yards in women's competition appears in the record books, but Frau Lina Radke of Germany set a world mark of 2:16 4-5 for 800 meters in the Olympics of 1928. This distance is about eight yards shorter than 880 yards.

PENN A. C. CREW GAINS IN BELGIAN REGATTA

Eight-Oared Shell Beats France and Meets Italy, Denmark in Final Today.

QUINCY BOAT IS BEATEN

Eliminated in Four-Oared Event When Denmark Overhauls Americans Near Finish.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LIEGE, Belgium, Aug. 16.—The Penn A. C. eight-oared crew was victorious over France in the semi-final race of the international regatta today, but the American four-oared boat from Quincy, Ill., was eliminated by Denmark. P. McGovern of Philadelphia, who participated in the skiff events, also was defeated by Lafontaine, Ghent oarsman.

In the eight-oared contest the Americans won decisively, leading the French from the start. They finished four lengths ahead in the time of 5 minutes 20 seconds.

Danes Begin to Pull Up.

The Quincy boat led in the four-oared race up to the 1,000-meter mark, when the Danish crew pulled up beside it, and over the remainder of the course the shells ran almost bows abreast, so it was impossible to see which crew had the advantage until the last few strokes. Then the Danes drew ahead and shot over the mark one-fifth of a second in the lead. The time was 5 minutes 50 seconds.

The weather was improved today, and there was a good crowd at the exposition grounds and lining the Meuse to see the races. There was a strong wind, however, and choppy water to contend with.

Americans Favorites in Final.

LIEGE, Belgium, Aug. 16 (AP).—The eight-oared shell representing the Penn A. C. of Philadelphia, by virtue of its victory over France today, is the favorite to win in the final. Tomorrow the Americans will meet Italy and Denmark. In the semi-final Italy defeated Poland and Denmark won from Yugoslavia.

In the semi-final of the four-oared event today Italy defeated Switzerland and Holland's crew won from France.

HOTSY TOTSY WINS IN GOLD CUP RACE

Kliesrath Boat Averages More Than 52 Miles an Hour to Gain Trophy at Red Bank.

IMP IS FORCED TO QUIT

Defender Burns Bearing in 2d Heat After 56.4 Mile an Hour Speed in 1st.

SEVEN IN FIELD AT START

Victorious Craft Has Only Two Rivals in Third Heat and Merely Loafs Over the Line.

By VERNON VAN NESS.

Special to The New York Times.

RED BANK, N. J., Aug. 16.—Hotsy Totsy, owned and driven by Victor Kliesrath of Port Washington, L. I., won the twenty-eighth annual Gold Cup race today, leading a starting field of seven boats. Her average speed was better than 52 miles an hour.

Hotsy Totsy, with only two other boats competing in the final heat, loafed her way to victory, as it was necessary for her to finish no better than second in this heat to win on points.

Richard F. Hoyt, fellow-townsman of Kliesrath, driving the Imp, the defending craft, got into trouble in the second heat when the boat burned out a bearing after winning the first heat in the fast time of 56.4 miles an hour, which was six miles an hour better than his speed last year when he won the cup.

Californian Is Forced Out.

In the first heat the Californian, driven by Dick Loynes of Long Beach, Cal., took the lead away from Hoyt in the second lap and held it until it was forced out in the sixth lap of the race with a broken strut.

Hoyt, with a clear lead over all the competing boats, developed engine trouble on the back stretch of the course and limped his way to a barge, where they threw down the cradle and pulled him aboard. He posed with Kliesrath and his mechanic while Charles F. Chapman presented the Port Washington driver with the cup.

The unlimited 151 hydroplane race, which had attracted much interest, was called off because only one of the dozen or so boats was equipped with a super-charger, which would have made it a walkaway for the designated boat. These craft will compete in the limited 151 hydroplane race tomorrow.

The national sweepstakes tomorrow is expected to bring together one of the fastest fleets of power boats that ever have been assembled in this country.

Outboard Record Is Set.

The outboard events provided unusually close competition and a new world's record today. This record was made by Jack Wood of Detroit in Class B, Division 3, the average time being 37.69 miles per hour.

More than 200 outboard entries competed in the annual Middle Atlantic outboard motor championships in the various divisions and classes. The small speedboats skimmed over the water one after the other in rapid succession making it no uncommon sight to find the boats of the previous race still competing when a new division had started.

One of the big upsets came about in the Class C race where Mulford Scull of Ventnor City, N. J., beat H. G. Ferguson of California, the fastest amateur outboard driver in the world, in a thrilling race. Scull jumped into an early lead, but was hard pressed at the finish to defeat the veteran by a hair's breadth.

Scull Keeps Record Clear.

In both heats of the race Scull, who last year won the Lipton Cup at Philadelphia and who, this season is still unbeaten, managed to keep ahead of his rival for the entire distance.

Ted Roberts of New York captured the Class B, division 3, title by outdistancing Kenneth Mackenzie and Edward Hauptner, while in the same class, division 1 and 2, Walter T. Bew easily triumphed.

Gar Wood of Detroit, who will defend the Harmsworth International Trophy at Detroit next month, flew to the races. He landed his big seaplane on the river shortly after the first heat, but took off again before the final heat was run.

Closely Bunched Field in St. Paul Open Golf Tourney Led by Manero With 139

MANERO'S 139 TOPS ST. PAUL GOLF FIELD

New Yorker Takes Lead in $10,000 Open Event With 70 on Second Round.

ROUSE ONE STROKE BEHIND

Scores a 68 for Lowest Card of Day—Sarazen and Hackbarth Have Totals of 141.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Aug. 16 (AP).—Another round of sub-par golf today left Tony Manero, wiry New York professional, one shot ahead of a closely bunched field in St. Paul's seventy-two-hole $10,000 open championship over the wind-blown Keller course.

Unperturbed by the treacherous wind that stopped most of the leaders, Manero today circled the course in 70 strokes, which, added to his 69 of yesterday, gave him a total of 139, five strokes under par for the thirty-six-hole stretch.

An eagle 3 on the 510-yard twelfth was the bright spot on Manero's card today. A thirty-yard pitch shot that sailed right into the cup was responsible for the bit of good fortune.

Rouse Gets Four Birdies.

One stroke behind Manero, as the result of the best round of the day's play, came Sonny Rouse, young Chicago professional. Rouse toured the course today in 68, four under par, for a 140 total. The Chicago star played a flawless game, bagging birdies on the four long holes and holding par even on the others. He went out in 34 and came home with the same score.

Gene Sarazen of New York, who topped the field yesterday with his record of 67, fell into a bad putting epidemic today but came in with a 74, which landed him in third place, with a 141 total. The former national open champion three-putted three greens and lost opportunities for birdies on several holes because his putter refused to work.

Tied with Sarazen was Otto Hackbarth, Cincinnati veteran. Hackbarth, who landed second yesterday with a 68, had a fine chance to take the lead today, but threw it away on the short thirteenth, where he took a five. He finished with two birdies, however, for a 73.

Horton Smith Dangerous.

So many stars were bunched within easy striking distance of the lead tonight that the championship, which will end tomorrow with two more 18-hole tests, appeared to be a toss-up. Three scant strokes behind Manero were three of the best shotmakers in the game, Horton Smith of the Cragston (N. Y.) Yacht and Country Club; Harry Cooper of Chicago, and Johnny Goodman, the Omaha amateur. The only out-and-out dark horse left with a good chance was Harold McSpaden of Bethel, Kan., who had 143 strokes.

Johnny Dawson of Chicago, Charley Lacey of Clement, N. J., and Tommy Armour of Detroit, Western open champion, were close behind with 144, while Walter Hagen, with 145, and Johnny Farrell, with 146, still had a chance.

Farrell almost ruined his chances today when he took a 78, ten shots more than he required yesterday, when he breezed around with a pretty 68. Poor putting and faulty judgment of approaches against the wind stopped Farrell.

Others still left with a chance were Willard Hutchinson, Chicago, who tied Hagen; Lester Bolstead of Minneapolis, former Big Ten champion, and Ed Dudley, Wilmington, Del., with 146s, and Al Espinosa of Chicago, runner-up in the 1929 national open, who had 147.

Because of the class of the field, the rest were definitely out of the running. Among them was Harrison (Jimmy) Johnston of St. Paul, national amateur champion, who had a total of 149 strokes.

Ben Ticknor and Parent Win Father and Son Golf Tourney

HOT SPRINGS, Va., Aug. 16 (AP).—Ben Ticknor 2d, captain-elect of the Harvard football team, teamed with his dad, C. D. Ticknor of New York, to win the annual father and son golf tournament at the Homestead course today with a low net score for eighteen holes of 72 strokes.

Fay Ingalls of Hot Springs and Dan Ingalls turned in the low gross with a round of 81. The tournament was played in two-ball foursomes with father and son playing alternate shots and alternate drives. Mr. Ticknor and Ben Ticknor were out in 45 and back in 40 for a gross of 86, which with their 14 handicap gave them the low net score of 72.

HUNT TOPS SIXTEEN IN MINEOLA SHOOT

Wins High Scratch Cup at Nassau Club's Traps—Moffatt Scores at Jamaica Bay.

Lynn Hunt led a field of sixteen gunners at the Mineola traps of the Nassau Trapshooting Club yesterday. He took the High Scratch Cup by breaking 97 out of a possible 100 targets. Eight gunners tied for the High Handicap Cup. J. Banzer won the shoot-off.

Sports of the Times

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

By JOHN KIERAN.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y., Aug. 16.—A short, stout, elderly fellow, wearing a pulled-down Panama, strolled across the clubhouse porch before the big race, studying a program with great intensity. "If he could pick 'em the way he used to make 'em run," said a regular railbird, "he'd win a million a month."

"Who is he?"

"Snapper Garrison."

There was a North-and-South, Blue-and-Gray, Civil War touch to the Gallant Fox-Whichone debate. Gallant Fox is quartered on the northerly side of the northernmost stable of the Saratoga racing plant. Whichone has an apartment clear across the track on the south side of one of the southerly stables.

Another item along the same line is that Sande hails from the comparative North, Idaho, and Sonny Workman hails from Baltimore, which is south of the Battery, at least.

Sande's singing in the saddle has come in for many fashionable comments from time to time, but Workman has talents of his own. He can read print upside down faster than any one around the track and he writes with both hands.

There are signs conspicuously posted all around the track warning regulars and casual visitors that gambling is strictly forbidden. But there's no harm in writing a little business note to an acquaintance who may be a bookmaker, is there?

The investors were worrying about the weather this morning. Whichone rooters wanted a hot, sunny afternoon to dry out the track. One of them stepped up to a man who looked like a native and said: "Hey, what sort o' weather will we have this afternoon?" "Search me," said the supposed native, scanning the skies anxiously, "I'm a stranger in these parts."

A Matter of Times.

It takes weeks, sometimes months, to get a horse into shape to run approximately two minutes. It takes an hour to cool out a thoroughbred after a race. Sometimes it takes days to cool out losing bettors, especially if their horse has been left at the post.

When Frisius of the Belair Stud was left flat-footed at the post a few days ago, Archibald said to Major Algernon Daingerfield, secretary to the Jockey Club: "There's one more argument for the starting stalls." "They're coming," said Major Daingerfield, sorrowfully, "but I hate to see them. We're getting too mechanical, too professional."

It's Major Daingerfield's argument that a good post horse and a good post jockey should have a chance to prove it by their talents, since it's all a part of the racing game.

"When they get a real good gate I'll give in," said Major Daingerfield, "but they haven't got it yet. Out West one of those big mechanical gates stuck—John D. Hertz was telling me this—and they had to rush a lot of men to pull it off the track before the horses came around. They just did make it, but they were pretty close to a terrible mixup. At Latonia the gate stuck and they couldn't get it off. The assistant starters had to run up the track and stop the race by throwing their coats over the horses' heads as they came on."

There are two chutes at Saratoga and starting stalls are used there. There is no difficulty about having starting stalls in the chutes. The trick is to get a puncture-proof stall contraption for the main track, one that won't fail to swing off on schedule.

Chatter and Chaff.

There was plenty of pick-up polo on Whitney Field here during the past week. Guest, Gerry and Iglehart were among those knocking the ball around in the morning and watching the races during the afternoon.

Whichone has an old Negro groom who rubs and brushes him English-fashion, making a hissing sound as he goes over the Whitney star. Gallant Fox has a watchdog anchored just outside his stall, a woolly animal, half collie, half Samoyede, and not half friendly to strangers.

Early rising isn't as popular as it was in other years. In the old days the owners and trainers had their strings out shortly after dawn and the workouts were practically over by 8 o'clock in the morning. Now the traffic on the track is heaviest at 8 A. M.

They moved the steeplechase up to first place on the program today. It has been many years since the jumpers led off a Saratoga program. Perhaps they wanted to be sure of plenty of time for getting the fallen riders out of the way before the big event of the afternoon.

Where there was once a fine flock of swans, young and old, on the little lake in the infield opposite the clubhouse, there are now only two avian aristocrats sailing solemnly around. Just another indication of the general slump.

John A. Morris, who succeeded George H. Bull as treasurer and secretary of the Saratoga Racing Association, is a member of the old Morris family after whom the Morris Park track was named more than half a century ago.

Strangers come and go but the old racing families still continue at Saratoga, the Epsom of America.

NOEL RETAINS SWIM TITLE.

Defends New England 300-Yard Medley Championship.

Special to The New York Times.

WINTHROP, Mass., Aug. 16.—Carrington Noel, Worcester Boys' Club, successfully defended his 300-yard medley crown in the senior New England A. A. U. championship swim, held as part of the Winthrop tercentenary race program at the Winthrop Yacht Club today.

In the junior 300-yard medley for women, another New England A. A. U. championship, Anna Tully of the Worcester Women's Swimming Association led Helen Delaney of the Boston Swimming Association by six yards.

The summaries:

300-Yard Medley (Senior N. E. A. A. A. U. championship)—Won by Carrington Noel, Worcester Boys' Club; William Squires, Boston Swimming Association, second; John Meaney, Boston Boys' Club, third. Time—4:29 4-5.

100-Yard Free Style Open—Won by John Osipowich, Worchester Boys' Club; Henry McNamara, Boston Swimming Association, second; Charles Kyle, Boston Boys' Club, third. Time—1:07 1-5.

300-Yard Medley (Junior N. E. A. A. A. U. championship)—Won by Anna Tully, Worcester Women's Swimming Association; Helen Delaney, Boston Swimming Association, second; Rena McDonald, Boston Swimming Association, third. Time—5:00.

Lewis and Cawse Win Tennis Title.

Richard Lewis and Al Cawse, former national veterans' champion, defeated Russell and Gene Phillips, 6—2, 6—3, 2—6, 2—6, 6—2, yesterday for the Staten Island doubles title at the Staten Island Cricket and Tennis Club.

Acme Wheelmen in 10-Mile Race.

The Acme Wheelmen will hold a ten-mile handicap and two sprints, one for Class A competitors and the other for Class B men, along Pelham Parkway, Bronx, this morning.

PONZI AND HOPPE DIVIDE.

Latter Wins, 125-73, After Losing in Afternoon by 125 to 60.

Andrew Ponzi and Willie Hoppe divided the ninth and tenth blocks of their twelve-block pocket billiard match at the Strand Billiard Academy yesterday, Ponzi winning in the afternoon, 125 to 60, in ten innings, and Hoppe triumphing at night, 125 to 73, in twelve innings. Ponzi is certain of victory in the match, which is being contested on a block basis, having won nine of the blocks to date, Hoppe's triumph in last night's session being his first in the match. Ponzi also leads in points, 1,198 t 594.

High runs were Ponzi 50, Hoppe 30 in the afternoon, and Hoppe 17, Ponzi 23 at night.

MAYO WINS AT GOLF; DEFEATS MOFFETT

Sets Back Metropolitan Junior Champion, 2 and 1, in Final at Green Meadow.

15-FOOT PUTT DECISIVE

Son of Pomonok Professional Shows Mettle Under Fire by Triumphing on 17th.

By WILLIAM D. RICHARDSON.

Special to The New York Times.

HARRISON, N. Y., Aug. 16.—After submitting to six consecutive defeats at the hands of Bobby Moffett, present holder of the Metropolitan junior championship, Charles H. Mayo Jr., son of the Pomonok professional, finally turned today in the final round of the annual Green Meadow invitation tournament.

With the match all even at the ninth hole, Mayo, partly through his opponent's misplays, but chiefly through his own brilliance, broke his persistent jinx by holing a fifteen-foot putt for a birdie 3 on the seventeenth to win, 2 up and 1 to play.

Mayo got into the final by eliminating Dick Chapman, the Eastern interscholastic champion, in a thrilling semi-final round match this morning, while Moffett equaled par to administer a 6 and 5 defeat to C. Ward Birch of Brooklawn, conqueror of George Voigt in the Metropolitan amateur this year.

In the first nine holes there was little to choose between the two finalists. Moffett took the lead by holing a fifteen-foot putt for a birdie 2 on the fourth, but lost his advantage when he drove into the gully on the sixth, which was the point where a driving rain descended on the pair, drenching them for the next two holes. He lost the eighth through taking three putts, but won the ninth with a 5 when Mayo was short of the green on his third.

Mayo Forges to Front.

From there on Mayo put up a great exhibition, not only of golf, but of gameness. His mashie-niblick play and putting was especially effective and it was through his approaching and putting that he won the match. Moffett left the door open when he drove into a bunker and put his third shot into the brook playing the tenth hole and cut his mashie-niblick shot to the eleventh.

Undaunted by a setback that reduced his lead to only a hole, where it looked as though he might be 3 up after the tee shots, Mayo had to make a wonderful recovery at the sixteenth to preserve his lead. He hooked his drive badly, but approached to within six feet and holed the putt after being almost stymied by Moffett. The putt on the next green settled matters.

The cards:

Out—
Mayo	5	3	4	3	4	4	4	4	6—37
Moffett	5	3	4	2	4	x	4	5	5—
Match all even.
In—
Mayo	5	4	4	4	4	5	3	3
Moffett	x	6	3	4	4	5	3	4
Mayo wins, 2 and 1.

Moffett Starts at Fast Clip.

Moffett started at such a fast clip in the morning that he soon left Birch completely in the lurch. He began by holing an eight-foot putt for a birdie 2 on the second, took the third with a par 4, and should have been 3 up at the fourth, but three-putted, and his opponent holed a ten-footer for his half after being in a bunker.

That was the last Birch saw of Moffett, who played magnificent golf the rest of the way out for a par equaling 34, which left him 5 up. The only hole Birch won during the entire match was the tenth, and his laying Moffett a stymie did that.

Bobby missed a three-footer for a victory on the eleventh, but his par figures gave him the next two holes and the match was over. They played out the bye holes and the winner had a 71 to equal par.

The cards:

Out—
Moffett	4	2	4	4	4	4	3	4	5—34
Birch	4	3	5	4	4	5	4	4	6—39
Moffett, 5 up.
In—
Moffett	6	5	3	4	4	4	3	4	4—37—71
Birch	5	5	4	5	4	5	3	4	5—40—79
Moffett wins, 6 and 5.

Outcome Always in Doubt.

The Mayo-Chapman match was a far different affair, with the outcome in doubt right to the end. They were all even at the turn, both out in 36. Chapman won the first and sixth and Mayo the second and fifth, holing a five-foot putt for a birdie 3 to become 1 up, but losing his advantage by topping his drive and taking a 5 on the next one.

Chapman assumed the lead by holing a four-yard putt for a 5 in the tenth, Mayo taking three to get down from the edge of the green. The holes that eventually decided the match in Mayo's favor were the fourteenth and fifteenth. He squared the match with a 4 to Chapman's 5 on the fourteenth, the Greenwich youngster's second shot going over the green, and approached to within two feet of the hole for a birdie 4 on the fifteenth to become 1 up.

With that margin he proceeded to hang on, and by halving the next three holes in par figures won the match by 1 up.

The cards:

Out—
Mayo	5	3	5	3	3	5	3	4	5—36
Chapman	4	4	5	3	4	4	3	4	5—36
Match all even.
In—
Mayo	6	4	3	5	4	4	3	4	5—38—74
Chapman	5	4	3	5	5	5	3	4	5—39—75
Mayo wins, 1 up.

Stagg, at 68, Eager for Work With His 39th Chicago Squad

CHICAGO, Aug. 16 (AP).—Amos Alonzo Stagg Sr. was 68 years old today—and was just as eager to begin work with his thirty-ninth University of Chicago football squad as he was when he assumed charge of athletics on the Midway in 1892.

"The Old Man" perhaps was a little more eager than ever, in contemplating his work, because his son, Paul, with a year of varsity experience, probably will be the Maroons' regular quarterback.

The younger Stagg had no competitive football experience before he joined the 1929 squad, but at the end of the season was successfully handling his father's complicated passing formation.

Mr. Stagg appears no older than 50, and follows a daily routine, which includes a tennis match with either Paul or his elder son, A. A. Jr.

TITLE SWIM IS WON BY MISS NALEVAIKO

Gains Metropolitan A. A. U. Senior 300-Meter Medley Crown at Jones Beach Park.

GRADY SCORES IN UPSET

Springs Surprise by Capturing 800-Meter Free Style Test—Fissler Double Victor.

Special to The New York Times.

WANTAGH, L. I., Aug. 16.—The capture of the Metropolitan A. A. U. senior 300-meter medley swimming championship by Miss Dorothy Nalevaiko of the Aquatic Club of Bayville, L. I., and an upset victory by Ben Grady, young New York A. C. fancy diver, in the junior 800-meter free-style title test, were features of a water carnival conducted by the Long Island Park Commission over a 50-meter course in Zachs Bay, Jones Beach Park, today.

Miss Eleanor Holm of the Women's S. A. of New York, medley champion, was not on hand to defend her crown, and Miss Nalevaiko won the event in 5:21, leading by 5 and 20 yards the Misses Margaret Decker and Jessie Conway, both wearers of the W. S. A., who followed her home in that order.

Grady, an unconsidered candidate for the 800-meter junior fixture, sprang a surprise by going to the fore at 150 meters and defying all efforts of his rivals to overtake him. He covered the distance in 11:55 2-5, excellent time considering that heats for the event were held a scant half hour before and finished 8 yards ahead of Charles Wiegand, unattached, whose brilliant final sprint enabled him to gain the place from the favorite, Leonard Spence of the New York A. C.

Grady and his Winged Foot club mate, George Fissler, were double winners. Nothing but scratch contests were on the card, and in addition to his title victory, Grady reaped the laurels in a diving event from 10-foot springboard. Fissler won the 100-meter free-style and back-stroke races, taking the former in 1:05 4-5 and the latter in 1:17 2-5.

Special cups offered for the clubs achieving the highest point tallies in the men and women's events were won by the New York A. C. and Women's S. A.

Field of 57 to Start Play Tomorrow in Women's National Tennis Championship

WOMEN'S NET PLAY STARTS TOMORROW

Field of 57 Entered in National Championship Opening at Forest Hills, L. I.

MRS. MOODY TO BE ABSENT

Titleholder Not to Defend Crown—Miss Nuthall Is General Favorite to Win.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

A women's national tennis championship without Mrs. Helen Wills Moody on the scene seems something of a misnomer, but in spite of the fact that the foremost woman player of the world will not defend the title which she has won six times the forty-third annual holding of this fixture, which begins tomorrow at the West Side Tennis Club, Forest Hills, L. I., will not lag for want of first-class tennis or exciting competition.

The absence of Mrs. Moody, while it deprives the tournament of its biggest drawing card, should result in giving the rest of the field of fifty-seven players an added incentive and so make the competition all the keener.

With the recognized world's champion in the lists there would be little, if any, question of the ultimate winner; in her abstention from the play the championship becomes an open race, even though there is one player who stands out as the general favorite.

Greatest Rivals Absent.

This player is Miss Betty Nuthall of England. Beaten by Mrs. Molla Mallory in the quarter-finals last year in the biggest upset of the tournament, the attractive young English girl, who has won such high favor with American galleries, returns to find her greatest rivals all absent from the scene.

Not only is Mrs. Moody not competing, but Miss Helen Jacobs of Berkeley, second in the national ranking, and Mrs. Mallory also are missing from the lists, while Mrs. Phoebe Watson of England, who was runner-up to Mrs. Moody last year, failed to come over for the championship.

It was the cruelest blow of misfortune Miss Jacobs has suffered during her career that she should have been forced out of competition owing to poor health in the year Mrs. Moody chose to let her title go by default.

Miss Nuthall's record for the season has not been particularly impressive, but those who have watched the hard-hitting English girl in practice against men players at Forest Hills during the last week are of the opinion that the championship will find her playing as good tennis as she put forth in the Wightman Cup matches last year, when she carried Mrs. Moody to 8—6, 8—6.

Favorite to Win Title.

Elmer Griffin, Long Island champion, who practices with Mrs. Moody each year at Forest Hills, is among those who have been playing against Miss Nuthall and he rates her as a pronounced favorite to win the title.

However, in spite of the enthusiastic reports about Miss Nuthall, it is no foregone conclusion that she will carry off the honors. At least there is a chance that some other player in the field will do the unexpected, which was regarded as hardly conceivable when Mrs. Moody was defending.

Foremost among those who loom as Miss Nuthall's most serious rivals are the Baroness Giacomo Giorgio Levi, champion of Rome. The Baroness, who is the former Miss Maude Rosenbaum of Chicago, gave so excellent an account of herself in her first grass court tournament of the year at Rye last week that almost overnight her prowess on the courts has come to be held in high respect.

During her short stay in the United States the Baroness has been coached by Charles Wood, the capable young instructor of the Fairview Country Club, and also has practiced considerably with Griffin. She has one of the most effective chop strokes of any woman in the game. Her volleys are made with severity and her foot-work is unusually good.

Others on the Entry List.

Besides the Baroness and Miss Nuthall, both of whom are seeded, there are three other visiting players in the entry, Miss Jean Burritt of Toronto and Miss Gladys Hutchings and Mrs. Beryl Robinson Cope of Bermuda. Mrs. K. J. Sherber of England, who is now living in this country, also might be included among the invading contingent.

Standing as America's hope of saving the title are a host of young players from almost every section of the country. Mrs. Lawrence A. Harper of Oakland, Cal.; Miss Marjorie Morrill and Miss Sarah Palfrey of Boston; Miss Mary Greef of Kansas City, and Miss Edith Cross, Miss Ethel Burkardt and Miss Josephine Cruickshank, all of California, are the most prominent among them.

Miss Eleanor Goss of New York, who has played extremely little this season, and Miss Virginia Hilleary of Philadelphia, who has a number of fine victories to her credit for the year, also are to be given consideration.

Until she lost to Miss Greef at East Hampton, Mrs. Harper had the best record among the American players at home, winning both the Longwood and Seabright tournaments. Her defeat by Miss Greef is characteristic of the upsets that have marked the season in women's tennis. So variable has been the form of all the players that no one stands out vividly among them, but it is from Mrs. Harper and Miss Morrill that the most is expected generally.

Miss Goss Doubtful.

Miss Goss, formerly the most dangerous rival of Mrs. Moody and Mrs. Mallory, has had so little competition this year that her possibilities are largely unknown. But if she hits with the same speed of service and ground strokes, and volleys and smashes with the decisiveness that characterized her play a few years back, she will have to be reckoned with seriously.

Miss Cross, the highest ranking American player in the tournament, and Miss Sarah Palfrey have been unable to find their top form since their return from the Wightman Cup matches abroad, but if they should hit their best stride this year they, too, will bear watching.

200-Pound Baltimore Middie Wins Freshman Strength Test

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Aug. 16.—Charles H. Clark of Baltimore is the strong man of the new fourth class at the Naval Academy, numbering nearly 500. He scored a total of 7,120 points in the strength tests to which every new midshipman is subjected.

Clark's total score is the highest tallied by a midshipman in several years. Clark weighs 200 pounds, plays football and lacrosse and boxes. He prepared at Severn School.

The members of the class who scored the next three highest totals were James W. Powell, Hertford, N. C., 6,580; John C. Hampson, Brooklyn, 6,440, and Benjamin F. Walker, Crawfordsville, Ind., 6,255.

BROOKLYN CRICKET VICTOR.

Triumphs Over Crescent A. C. in League Match by 25 Runs.

The Brooklyn Cricket Club yesterday defeated the eleven of the Crescent Athletic Club in a New York and New Jersey championship fixture on the grounds of the latter at Bay Ridge by a margin of 25 runs. The Brooklyn Cricket Club, first at bat, ran up a total of 125 runs. A. E. Edwards, 47; P. B. Green, 41, and J. L. Poyer, 24, did the best batting for the victors.

The Crescent Club responded with 100. Doubles were contributed by F. Cheeswright, 28; D. Brayshaw, 26; R. C. Rosser, 22, and A. Simpson, 11.

tion. In the final spurt West Sides slipped in half a length to the good. Leander was in third position when No. 2 slipped his oarlock two strokes from the finish and the crew stopped rowing.

The West Side Boat Club also scored for the United States in the 140-pound senior fours, beating the Don Rowing Club of Toronto, which finished second. The Detroit Boat Club was third.

Lachine did not face the starter in this event. All three crews battled evenly for nearly a mile when the Dons nosed ahead for a few odd feet, only to be replaced by West Sides, Detroit holding on well, but the West Sides rowing more easily. In the last yards the Dons pulled away from Detroit, but couldn't catch West Sides, who had two lengths at the finish. The winner's time was 7:50.

Detroit Juniors Triumph.

The Detroit Boat Club captured the race for 150-pound junior fours with coxswain in 7:57, with St. Catherines second, West Side third and Argonauts fourth.

McGill lined up and rowed for time, not competing for the prize, but merely in preparation for the Empire Games. Detroit secured an early lead. After a mile it was a procession, with St. Catharines three lengths behind McGill. Detroit won by a length.

Lachine, Montreal, scratched from the 150-pound senior fours event. Jubilee, Halifax and the other West Sides crews also scratched, giving the senior West Sides crew a row-over contest.

Joe Wright Jr., senior singles winner, also won the quarter-mile dash by about one length from V. Whelmeier of Detroit, who finished second. J. Durnan of the Toronto Dons was third. The winner's unofficial time was 1:18.

F. Burns, Argonauts, Toronto, won the 140-pound senior singles by three lengths from E. Whelpton, Leanders, who finished second, with Dr. W. Durnan, Argonauts, third. The time was 8:49.

The University Barge Club of Philadelphia defeated the Detroit Rowing Club in the senior doubles. No time was given.

Only two crews competed in the high school eights, a one-mile event, won by Hamilton in 5:41.

Lachine of Montreal led by a few feet for half the distance, when the Lachine stroke caught a crab and slipped his foot-rest, marring what had been a fine race.

Hamilton took the high school fours event in a row-over.

ALLISON BEATEN IN DOUBLES FINAL

Texan and Caswell Defeated by Rockafellow and Dawson in Maine Title Play.

SHIELDS SUBDUES DAWSON

New Yorker Wins Right to Meet Rockafellow Today for Crown in Singles.

PORTLAND, Me., Aug. 16 (AP).—Perry Rockafellow and Edgar F. Dawson, both of New York City, won the Maine State doubles championship today by defeating Wilmer Allison, Davis Cup star, and W. L. Caswell of Harrison, Me., in a sparkling four-set match, 11—9, 6—3, 4—6, 6—0.

Allison played dazzling tennis in an effort to carry the burden while his opponents bombarded his partner, Caswell, who was badly handicapped by an injured leg. The Texan played brilliant tennis, thrilling a large gallery time and again.

Frank X. Shields of New York and Rockafellow won the right to meet in the singles final at 11 o'clock tomorrow. Shields beat Dawson, 6—4, 6—0. Rockafellow had a harder battle winning from Albert Horton, 9—7, 6—1.

THE SUMMARIES.

BONNEAU-PARTRIDGE WIN.

Capture Doubles Championship in Yonkers Title Tennis.

Frank Bonneau and Melvin Partridge won the Yonkers City men's doubles tennis championship by defeating E. Frank Rodgers and James Landauer in the final of the annual tournament on the South Yonkers Tennis Club courts in South Yonkers yesterday.

With Bonneau and Partridge leading, 4—0, in the third set, after they had won the first two at 6—2, 6—1, play was halted by a heavy shower. Rather than force Partridge through postponement to lose another day from his vacation, which started yesterday, Rodgers and Landauer defaulted the match. Bonneau, whose all-around play featured the match, also won the doubles last year with Elliott Binzen as his partner.

English Cricket Results.

LONDON, Aug. 16 (Canadian Press).—Maurice J. Turnbull, young captain of Glamorganshire, scored 135 runs against Derbyshire at Derby in an English county cricket match today. Glamorgan's score for their first innings was 360 runs and when stumps were drawn Derby had scored forty-five runs for one wicket.

Closing scores follow:

Middlesex vs. Northamptonshire at Lord's—Middlesex, 284 (Matthews, 4 wickets for 65 runs); Northants, 60 for 3 wickets.

Essex vs. Sussex at Southbend—Sussex, 232 (Nichols, 5 wickets for 41 runs); Essex, 33 for the loss of no wickets.

Somerset vs. Warwickshire—Someret, 389 for 7 wickets (Wellard, 53, not out).

Lancashire vs. Kent at Dover—Lancs, 254 (Freeman, 5 wickets for 95 runs); Kent, 83 for 2 wickets.

Glamorganshire vs. Derbyshire at Derby—Glamorgan, 260 (Turnbull 135, Slater 4 wickets for 47 runs); Derby, 45 for 1 wicket.

Gloucestershire vs. Leicestershire at Cheltenham—Gloucester 19 for 8 wickets (Seabrooke 50, Carnet 51, Smith 52).

Nottinghamshire vs. Yorkshire at Bradford—Notts 152; Yorks, 201 for 2 wickets (Holmes 97, Mitchell 77, not out).

Warwickshire vs. Surrey at Birmingham—Warwick, 243 (Allom, 4 wickets for 61 runs); Surrey, 40 for the loss of no wickets.

VAN RYN CRUSHED BY MANGIN, 6-1, 6-1

By ALLISON DANZIG.

at his best. The Georgetown youth was rated as the best unseeded player at Wimbleton until Wilber Allison defeated Henri Cochet, and his performances in his first singles tournament since his return have made it understandable how he could have beaten H. W. Austin in the English championship in three successive sets.

The condition of the court militated against one player as much as it did the other this afternoon, so it could not be said that Mangin's victory, which reversed the result of their previous meeting at White Sulphur Springs, was attributable to the slipperiness of the turf. Both of them are excellent volleyers, but neither was able to exploit this ability and the match resolved itself into a test of their strength off the ground.

From the first point to the last, Mangin was hitting with blistering speed. His service sent the ball catapulting into the rear stands and his lightning bursts of speed in covering court made it exceedingly difficult to put the ball beyond his reach.

For the first set Mangin had things all his own way, for Van Ryn, while he was hitting crisply and soundly as he always does, could not get the range of the net and lines.

Van Ryn Increases Rallies.

In the second set Van Ryn began to reduce his errors and the length of the rallies increased, but without any fluctuation of the tide. Every brilliant stroke of the Wimbledon doubles champion served only to challenge his opponent to greater efforts, and Mangin broke through twice for a 3 to 0 lead.

Van Ryn, finding himself unequal to holding off Mangin in the back court, sought to get to the net three times in the third game, but each time was passed cleanly.

In the fourth game Mangin faltered for the only time in the match in the face of Van Ryn's sharpshooting returns, but he regained his stride in the fifth and took three games in a row.

Two service aces gave Mangin a lead of 30—0 in the sixth and after he had overcome Van Ryn's desperate efforts to save the game he broke through for the fourth time in the set to end the match.

Sutter's Shots Decisive.

Bell, in spite of the fact that the condition of the court favored his chop stroke, was never seriously in the running against Sutter. The New Orleans youth had the better control, the better length and also the more decisive finishing shots.

For the first set Sutter had no occasion to leave his back court. His mobile defense was equal to holding off both Bell's chops and slam drives, which he turned back repeatedly with blazing placements that won volleys of applause, and when the Texan sought the net he was generally dislodged either by Sutter's beautifully gauged lobs or passing shots.

In the second set, as Bell began to gain better control of his chop and to flog the ball into the corners with his drive, Sutter started to go to the net and lay down beautiful drop volleys. There was little to choose to 2-all. Then the confident, easy-going Tulane junior broke through in the fifth, only to yield the sixth to the grim-faced, wiry little Texan's superb shot making.

This exhibition by Bell, however, was his last bit of success, for Sutter returned the compliment in the seventh, pulled out the eighth from 15—40 as Bell's chops found the net, and broke through again in the ninth to win the match.

Rain Ends Doubles Play.

The semi-finals of the men's doubles were both interrupted late in the afternoon by another shower. Van Ryn and Mangin were leading H. G. N. Lee and S. J. Perry of England on service at 6—2, 2—6, 6—5, and Bell and Eddie Jacobs held a 3—2 advantage over Ellsworth Vines and Keith Gledhill in the first set when the players were driven from the courts.

Both of these matches will be resumed tomorrow morning at 11:30. At 12:15 will come the final of the women's doubles, followed by the concluding round of the women's singles an hour later. Mangin and Sutter will go on the courts at 2:30 and upon the completion of this match the final of the men's doubles will be staged.

THE SUMMARIES.

Men's Singles.

Semi-Final Round—Gregory Mangin defeated John Van Ryn, 6—1, 6—1; Clifford Sutter defeated Berkeley Bell, 6—4, 6—3.

Men's Doubles.

Semi-Final Round—Van Ryn and Mangin led H. G. N. Lee and S. J. Perry, 6—2, 2—6, 6—5, when match was called on account of rain; Bell and Eddie Jacobs led Ellsworth Vines and Keith Gledhill, 3—2 in first set when match was called.

Women's Singles.

Semi-Final Round—Miss Marjorie Gladman defeated Miss Clara Louise Zinke, 6—3, 6—3; Baroness Giacomo Giorgio Levi defeated Miss Helen Marlowe, 6—0, 6—3.

Women's Doubles.

Semi-Final Round—Miss Virginia Hilleary and Miss Dorothy Andrus defeated Miss Edith Cross and Miss Mianne Palfrey, 8—6, 5—7, 6—1; Miss Virginia Rice and Miss Zinke defeated Miss Gladman and Miss Josephine Cruickshank, 6—4, 5—7, 6—4.

BRITISH POLOISTS EXERCISE PONIES

Are Satisfied With Condition of Mounts After Hour's Work-out in Morning.

BALDING IN ROSLYN GAME

Takes Part in Contest With Ashtons and Others—U. S. Team in Test Match Today.

By ROBERT F. KELLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

WESTBURY, L. I., Aug 16.—On their first day in the country, the British polo team's routine consisted of pony exercise this morning and with watching one of its members, Gerald Balding, in a match at Roslyn in the afternoon.

Balding has been in the United States for more than a week and his six periods of play marked the third time he has been in competition during that time.

The main body of the challengers, which arrived yesterday on the Aquitania, was up before breakfast, and at Mitchel Field, where the players climbed on their ponies for an hour's exercise. They were well pleased with the way their ponies appeared, and tentative arrangements were made to start more serious work next Tuesday when the British will play an easy game, probably between the members of their own squad, on one of the Meadow Brook's fields.

A further tentative arrangement calls for a faster game against opposition to be selected on Thursday afternoon at the Meadow Brook Club.

The game at Roslyn was in place of the Army-Goulburn game at Meadow Brook, which was to be called off due to wet grounds. Talbott Field is firmer than any other in the locality and it was not cut up badly as the four Ashtons, young Earle Hopping, his father, Earle W. Hopping; Harold E. Talbott, Elmer J. Boeseke Jr., J. Cheever Cowdin, Robert E. Strawbridge Jr. and the British internationalist Gerald Balding, played.

The sides were called the Red and White, with the Red side, on which the Ashtons played, winning the game, 13 to 6. There was no attempt to keep a summary and the Ashtons did not play together, three of them alternately sharing the Red side with Boeseke and Balding, the others cutting in on the other team.

The Australian brothers were factors in the game, their hitting and their ponies continuing to show the improvement evidenced the last time out.

Tomorrow at the Sands Point Club the Americans will hold a test match. The game is to start at 4 o'clock.

The line-up for tomorrow:

Whites.	Reds.
1—E. Pedley	1—E. J. Boeseke and G. P. Bostwick
2—E. A. S. Hopping	2—Gerald Balding
3—T. Hitchcock Jr.	3—Cecil Smith
Back—W. F. C. Guest	Back—H. W. Williams

WEST INDIANS IN FRONT.

Lead Jamaicans in Cricket Match by 11 Runs as Rain Halts Play.

A large crowd was at Dyckman Oval yesterday to witness the start of the two-day return cricket match between the Overseas West Indians and Jamaicans, and although rain interrupted the play, scores were low and both teams completed their first innings. The West Indians are 11 runs ahead, the Jamaicans having scored 63 and the West Indians 74. Play will be resumed this afternoon and a good finish should result.

NORTH SHORE SHOW DRAWS LARGE ENTRY

Well-Known Judges of Dogs to Officiate at Stony Brook Event Saturday.

SPECIALTY SET AUG. 30

Long Island Boston Terrier Club Entries Will Close Tomorrow—Other Kennel News.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

While entries have officially closed for the annual dog show of the North Shore Kennel Club, to be held on the grounds of the Old Field Club at Stony Brook, L. I., next Saturday, Aug. 23, the Foley organization has decided to keep them open as late as tomorrow to give everybody a chance to have their dogs on exhibition.

North Shore always attracts a good entry and a fine attendance. The scene of the show is accessible from New York and from Connecticut, with trains out of the Pennsylvania Station and the ferry from Bridgeport. The old Field Club at Stony Brook is about five miles east of Smithtown and is located directly on the Sound, having its own beach and park. An inlet has now been dredged and small motor boats may tie up at the dock.

The tents housing the benching will be erected on the lawns between the clubhouse and the inlet, the large trees providing plenty of shade. At noon a buffet luncheon will be served in the clubhouse and on the beach.

Well-Known Judges on List.

Some very well-known judges are numbered on the board, including a number of woman experts. Mrs. Orrae L. Billings of Norwich, N. Y., will pass on the bulldogs. Mrs. Richard V. Pell of Greenwich will cross the Sound to take the cairn terriers. Pekingese will have Mrs. Bertha Hanson of Little Falls, N. J., to make the awards, while the other toys will come under Mrs. Harrison D. Boyer of Springfield, N. J. Mrs. Helen Fargo Arnold of Smithtown Branch, L. I., will judge Dalmatians and Miss F. Isabel Ormiston of Bernardsville, N. J., the Schipperkees. St. Bernards will come before Mrs. Gertrude Davies Lintz of Brooklyn.

G. L. L. Davis of Westport, Conn., will judge fox terriers, Airedales and Welsh terriers, the terrier group and best in show. Andrew Albright Jr. of Newark is the all-around judge, will do the two sporting groups and the non-sporting group. A number of other well-known men will judge various breeds.

One of the most enjoyable events of the late Summer season is the Rhode Island Kennel Club's exhibition, which this year will be its twenty-sixth. It is beautifully staged at Oakland Farm, the Portsmouth estate of William H. Vanderbilt, who is always on hand during the day to greet his guests and entertain his friends at luncheon. The date of the show is Saturday, Aug. 30.

Benching is erected in the great riding hall, where the dogs are protected from excessive heat and rain, while the judging rings are pitched in the open. Practically all of the New York and New Jersey exhibitors make it a practice to take the Fall River boat the night before to Fall River and then catch the boat back at Newport after the close of the show. Entries were to have closed last night, but there is still time for the laggards. There is a strong board of judges, with Thomas Hissey of Elmhurst, L. I., judging "all other breeds," together with the special for best in show.

Entry Lists to Be Closed.

Several of the exhibitions to be held in early September will close their entries this week and fanciers should take notice of closing dates. Tuesday will be the last day for the chow chow fanciers to get their entries in for the second annual specialty show of the Penn-Jersey Chow Chow Club, which is to be held Monday, Sept. 1, at Evergreen Farms on the Lincoln Highway at Welsh Road, Philadelphia, fifteen miles from Trenton. Miss Alice M. Deignan of New York City will make the awards.

The Long Island Boston Terrier Club is to hold its specialty show at the Triangle Hof Brau Haus, Valley Stream, L. I., on Saturday, Aug. 30, and entries will close tomorrow for this event. Jacob Kats of Brooklyn will judge the exhibition.

Wednesday will close for the seventeenth annual dog show given in connection with the New York State Fair on the Fair Grounds at Syracuse, Sept. 3 to 5, inclusive. The judges include Frank H. Addyman of Ardsley, N. Y., as the all-arounder; James W. Spring of Boston for the terriers; Joseph H. Baldwin of Wilmington, Del., beagles and foxhounds; Dr. Roy H. Peck, Springfield, bulldogs; Mrs. F. E. Storer, Melrose, Mass., Boston terriers; Mrs. Orrae L. Billings, Norwich, N. Y., toys; Charles P. Schoen, Pittsfield, N. Y., collies; Arthur W. Taylor, Sherill, N. Y., English toy spaniels and Poms; Irving R. Johnson, Buffalo, dachshunde and Great Danes; Mrs. Harry L. Sears, Millburn, N. J., Pekingese; H. E. Mellenthin, Poughkeepsie, pointers and setters.

Lady Broadcast Wins Chicago Handicap, Defeating My Dandy by Six Lengths

HAWTHORNE RACE TO LADY BROADCAST

Scores Easily in the $10,000 Chicago Business Men's Handicap and Collects $8,875.

PAYS BACKERS $19.74 FOR $2

My Dandy Is Second, Uncommon Gold Third—Suitor Wins $5,000 Windy City Stakes.

CHICAGO, Aug. 16 (AP).—Lady Broadcast, the 4-year-old chestnut filly from R. Caldwell's stable, making her second start here, outclassed a classy field to easily win the Chicago Business Men's Handicap, the $10,000 added feature, at Hawthorne today.

My Dandy, coupled with Brown Wisdom as the W. C. and E. W. Reichert entry, turned the tables on his stable-mate, to take the second portion of the purse, while Uncommon Gold, grouped in the "field," from Clayton Morris's stable, was third, with Islam, also grouped in the field, fourth.

The race was for 3-year-olds and up, over the mile and an eighth distance, and carried a net value of $8,875 to the winner, $2,000 to the second, $1,000 to the third and $500 to the fourth stable. It was run in the fast time of 1:50 flat, three-fifths of a second slower than the track record.

Lady Broadcast rewarded her followers at $19.74 to $2 in the mutuels pay-off.

Lady Broadcast was taken into third place during the first flight and was rated along nicely in that position to the approach to the home turn, where Jockey J. Marcum shook her up, and responding gamely, went into a long lead to win easily by six lengths. My Dandy set a fast pace to the home turn and held on well after being headed by the winner, to take the place by a length and a half. Uncommon Gold finished fast to take third money by a nose from Islam.

The Windy City Claiming Stakes, a gallop over the mile and a sixteenth distance for 3-year-olds and up, with $5,000 added, was won by E. J. Lehmann's Suitor, with Miss Bess second and Zida third.

The summaries:

FIRST RACE—Purse $1,200; claiming; 3-year-olds and upward; one mile and three-sixteenths.

J. A. Well, 110	(Hanford)	6.12	3.10	2.56
Fort Dearborn, 108	(M'cum)	....	3.42	1.80
Vanquish, 115	(L. Jones)	....	....	3.32

HARTFORD IS READY FOR HARNESS RACES

Eastern Grand Circuit Loop to Open Tuesday at Charter Oak Park.

CHESTNUT BURR ENTERED

Recent Record-Breaker Will Compete in the 2-Year-Old Trot on Wednesday.

After a lapse of three weeks, Grand Circuit harness racing will be resumed Tuesday at Hartford, Conn., when the Eastern loop gets under way at Charter Oak Park. A renewal of the Charter Oak Purse and a series of colt races for trotters and pacers will be the feature events at the meeting.

Outstanding among the entries will be Chestnut Burr, a colt from the Blue Ridge Stables of Kansas City, which twice within two weeks has set world's records for 2-year-olds over a half-mile track, at Goshen and at Middletown. At Goshen, Chestnut Burr trotted in 2:09½ while defeating the great colt Protector. Last Wednesday at Middletown, Chestnut Burr further lowered the mark when he won in 2:08¾.

Chestnut Burr will appear at Hartford on Wednesday in the 2-year-old trot which will feature that day's racing. His opponets will be Calumet Boss, Sealing Wax, Calumet Belrica and a number of others which have shown their ability to trot in 2:10. The 2-year-old purse will be held on the same day, with Corporal Lee, Handy Volo and Katrina favored in that order.

Fine Field Is Promised.

The Charter Oak Purse will be raced Thursday, and it will bring out one of the best fields of horses ever seen in the time-honored event. The list of starters will include Hollyrood Harrod, which won the $10,000 trot at Kalamazoo and raced in 2:02¼ at Toledo; Hollyrood Chief, which defeated Hollyrood Harrod at Lexington last Fall, and Tronia Britton, winner of the $10,000 trot at Windsor and winner at Goshen over Caretaker, another starter.

On Thursday there also will be a handicap pace, the entries including Widow Grattan, Harry D., The Royal Lady, Blushing Beauty and Trampsmug.

Hambletonian on Aug. 27.

The climax of the Eastern loop of the Grand Circuit will come at Goshen on Wednesday, Aug. 27, with the running of the $70,000 Hambletonian Stake. Present indications are that fifteen or more will start, which would set a record for this 3-year-old trot, as in its inaugural year, 1926, at Syracuse, fourteen started, which number has not been exceeded.

The Hanover Shoe Farm's filly Hanover's Bertha (2), 2:02, and the Coldstream Farm entry, Main McElwyn (2), 2:02¾, continue to be favored, but an upset would not be surprising, as five of the eligibles have trotted in 2:04 or better in races this year.

†Ran out. ‡Fell.

Scratched—Bangle.

Personality, well handled, was under restraint for a turn of the field, moved up fast a half mile from home and gradually wore down Beelzebub to win going away. Beelzebub jumped well and showed good speed all the way, hanging on well under hard urging. Caid moved up threateningly after a mile and a half, but tired in the final stages. Jolly Roger was going easily when he fell at the ninth jump. Rooney ran out of the course while in a contending position. Huffy was outrunt and made several bad landings.

aH. P. Whitney entry; bMiddleburg Stable entry.

Scratched—Sunny Lassie, Dark Magnet, Zaidee, Rockbelle, Finger Tips, Timely, Stefana and Nerva.

Risque, at home in the going, broke running, was eased back in the early part, came with a powerful rush in the stretch and was up to win in the last stride. Baba Kenny displayed a world of speed in the going, opened a wide lead and held on gamely. Panasette was hard ridden all the way and tired badly in the stretch. Amerisk got away slowly and closed with a rush. Firetop closed a big gap. Ladana did not like the going. Buckup had no mishap.

Owners—1, J. D. Hertz; 2, E. R. Bradley; 3, H. P. Whitney; 4, Middleburg Stable; 5, M. L. Schwartz; 6, J. E. Widener; 7, H. P. Whitney; 8, Rancocas Stable; 9, W. R. Coe; 10, Middleburg Stable; 11, W. S. Kilmer; 12, S. W. Labrot; 13, G. D. Widener; 14, Glen Riddle Farm.

1103 FOURTH RACE—The Waterboy Handicap; $1,200 added; 3-year-olds and upward; Wilson mile. Start poor; won easily; place same. Winner, blk. c., 4, by Nogofol—Marking. Trainer, G. L. Arvin. Time—0:25, 0:49, 1:15, 1:41.

Scratched—Sun Falcon and Jim Dandy.

Folking got away well, was kept close up to stretch turn, where he slipped through on the inside and, taking a long lead, won galloping. Bobashela raced Gold Brook into defeat and then tired. Doctor Freeland trailed the field to the stretch, where he closed with a rush. Gold Brook had plenty of speed for seven furlongs. Glossin showed good speed for half a mile, then quit.

Owners—1, H. T. Archibald; 2, Audley Farm; 3, W. J. Salmon; 4, Howe Stable; 5, R. B. Straussburger.

1104 FIFTH RACE—The Travers Midsummer Derby; $5,000 added and $25,000 guaranteed; 3-year-olds; one mile and a quarter. Start good (moving); won galloping; place easily. Winner, ch. c., 3, by Jim Gaffney—Thunderbird. Trainer, J. B. McKee. Value to winner, $27,050; second, $4,000; third, $2,000; fourth, $500. Time—0:23⅘, 0:48⅘, 1:14⅗, 1:41, 2:08.

Scratched—Caruso.

Jim Dandy broke slowly, but was kept close to the early pace. He slipped through on the inside around the turn, drew out and won galloping. Gallant Fox was well up, showed his speed, but was all out to gain the place. Whichone was used up racing Gallant Fox into defeat and stopped fast in the final furlong. Whichone pulled up very lame. Sun Falcon was outrun.

Owners—1, C. Earl; 2, Belair Stud; 3, H. P. Whitney; 4, W. S. Kilmer.

1105 SIXTH RACE—The Elmendorf; purse $1,000; maiden 2-year-olds; five and a half furlongs. Start good; won easily; place same. Winner, b. c., by Traumer—Sun Polly. Trainer, J. H. Stotler. Time—0:23⅘, 0:48⅘, 1:09⅗.

aM. L. Schwartz-E. M. Byers entry. bW. H. Travers-E. L. Hancock entry.

Scratched—Center Stone.

Rip Van Winkle, at home in the going, raced Commuter down and drew away at the end. Commuter, a rapid breaker, opened a wide early lead, but tired badly in the stretch. Jubilation was outrun to the stretch, but finished with a rush. Sir John Alden ran a good race. Gaelic Prince ran a real good race and is worth remembering. Chief John had no mishap.

JIM DANDY, 100 TO 1, BEATS GALLANT FOX

By BRYAN FIELD.

couldn't do it. Going around the bend he was a neck or perhaps half a length to the good, but this was due as much to his shorter course along the rail as to any superior speed on the part of Whichone.

In the first furlong of the backstretch run Gallant Fox drew even. In the second furlong he went ahead. In the third furlong came the high point of the race. Going to the far turn, Whichone again closed on Gallant Fox and again got his head in front. Many thought Gallant Fox was beaten, but he was far from that. On he came, still covering extra ground on the outside, and he engaged Whichone on even terms.

Then came the surprise. Jim Dandy skimmed along the rail and ran off and left the other two.

The cheering died. Then it resumed, for none believed Jim Dandy could stay in front. But Jim Dandy kept going farther and farther away and won in a gallop, with Jockey Frank Baker looking back to see what was happening.

He saw Whichone suddenly stop inside the quarter pole. Gallant Fox drew off from him and beat him easily for the place by six lengths, but he could not gain an inch on Jim Dandy. The winner carried 120 pounds, as against 126 each for Gallant Fox and Whichone, and covered much less ground as he was on the rail all the way, while Workman's tactics forced the battle out in the middle of the track. Sun Falcon carried 117 pounds and never was in the race.

Mr. and Mrs. John D. Hertz were present to see one of the most thrilling victories which ever has come to their silks. Risque, the daughter of Stimulus and Risky, won the Spinaway with its purse of $10,000 in fashion as game as ever was shown by Anita Peabody, the great race mare of the Hertzs which reigned several years ago.

Panasette, Favorite, Third.

A nose at the end of the six furlongs was the margin of victory, with E. R. Bradley's Baba Kenny second and Mr. Whitney's Panasette third.

Risque was on top after a smart break by Eddie Steffen, but Baba Kenny on the outside went to the front with a show of foot which was not to be denied. Panasette and George D. Widener's Sovietta, further out, ran up to threaten Baba Kenny and pass Risque. This all happened on the bend, and it appeared as if Risque merely was a fast breaker.

But Risque was not tired. She merely had been taken back by Steffen. When the top of the stretch was reached Baba Kenny was several lengths in front and apparently a sure winner when Risque came on again.

Going to the outside of Baba Kenny, Risque ran down the other filly at the quarter pole, and from there to the finish the two ran head and head and stride for stride. Neither horse would give in and they crossed the line deadlocked. It was the first victory scored here this season for Mr. and Mrs. Hertz, who are the owners of Reigh Count.

Risque Carries 122 Pounds.

For Baba Kenny it must be said that she was close to the rail and had the poorer footing of the two. But Risque carried 122 pounds, as against 115 for Mr. Bradley's horse. The time was 1:16 3-5 for the six furlongs.

The thirty-second running of the Beverwyck Steeplechase started the day off with a victory for an outsider when Val Crane's Personality won, paying 10 to 1.

Despite the fact that the races started at 3:15 o'clock, fifteen minutes later than usual, many persons were not in their seats for the running of the 'chase. Automobiles were stalled in long lines on all the driveways moving at a snail's pace. The congestion was great in the grand stand and even in the clubhouse.

Heavy Demand for Tables.

Harry Stevens was overwhelmed with requests for clubhouse tables, and the unprecedented course was followed of serving luncheon on the topmost deck of the clubhouse, normally little used, as it is so far a climb from the ground and the betting ring.

The patrons who secured table reservations were the lucky ones, as they were comfortable, had seats and were well served, while hundreds of clubhouse guests had to stand in aisles and on stairways. The largest crowd since the train has been put on came up on the Saratoga Special from New York.

The congestion still was intense when the six horses came out for the Beverwyck, which had a prize of $3,950 for the winner. Jolly Roger, the Greentree Stable's veteran jumper, was made the 9-to-10 favorite, but he went out of the running quickly when he fell on the first turn of the field.

E. R. Bradley's Beelzebub then ran into the lead and remained in front until the big push developed in the last three-quarters of a mile. Here Caid, the imported jumper of which so much has been said, challenged and came on to look like a winner.

But Beelzebub engaged his rush and ran him stride for stride until Caid dropped back. Mr. Bradley's horse then drew off and for a time seemed to be safe, but another bid developed back of him, and this one was to prove successful. Jockey Everett brought Personality along with a great rush, and although he cleared the last fence a length or more back of Beelzebub, he ran him down in the home stretch and won by a length and a half.

Caid was beaten ten lengths for the place. Rooney ran out of the course. The time was 4:21 4-5.

Voltear, 11 to 5, Wins.

The Plattsburg purse, which followed next on the program, was won by the Dixiana Voltear, 11-to-5 favorite, and immediately after the finish an announcement was made that all who wished might go into the infield. The steeplechase had been moved up to first place to permit this.

At this time the remote field stand was filled to overflowing, and the fence rail as far around as half a mile from the finish was lined several deep with spectators.

Voltear is a natural mudder, and he was not long in showing to the front after a good break from the stalls in the seven-furlong chute. Chatford, as usual, misbehaved at the barrier, but he got off well despite all his cutting up.

Voltear took the lead at the far turn and once in front was never seriously threatened, winning by two lengths. Hornpipe was second, while Flying Max, a 20-to-1 shot, got up to land third by a head from the tiring Calwick. The time was 1:27 2-5.

Keogh, American Jockey, Wins Astride Potiphar in Paris

Potiphar, from the stable of Jefferson Davis Cohn and ridden by the American jockey, Frank Keogh, scored by a length over Brian Boroimhe in the recent running of the Prix Eugene Adam at the Maisons-Laffittee course in Paris. Mefisto was third in the field of ten that raced over the route of 2,000 meters for a purse of 125,000 francs. The second and third horses were separated by a length, while Mefisto finished a head in front of Romarin to gain third money. The winner was well supported in the betting and paid 13 francs for each 5 invested on his chances.

JIM DANDY 50-1 VICTOR AT SARATOGA IN 1929

Surprised in Grand Union Hotel Stakes—Was Prepared at Tanforan for Travers.

The record of Jim Dandy is one of the most unusual in the history of the turf, for while in two seasons of racing he has been unplaced in sixteen of his twenty starts, two of his three victories have been sensational upsets in classic stakes over highly rated horses. Both of these upsets were tallied at Saratoga, and under bad track conditions.

Last year Jim Dandy captured the Grand Union Hotel Stakes over a heavy track when he was rated the rank outsider at 50 to 1. He was an added starter, and the field included such brilliant juveniles as Caruso, Mokatam, Sarazen II, Hi-Jack and Mr. Sponge. Johnny Maiben rode him, and he turned in much the same kind of a race as the son of Jim Gaffney did yesterday, trailing in the ruck in the early stages but moving up with a mighty rush in the stretch.

Jim Dandy was something of a stranger to New York racegoers this season, as he had started only once at Saratoga before yesterday's race and finished eighth in a field of nine. The Beasel won this race, which was the Burnt Hills Handicap, and was run on Aug. 8.

The winner of the 1930 Travers, however, had seen an extensive but highly unsuccessful campaign at Agua Caliente last Winter. He was started in the Agua Caliente Derby and three handicaps, but failed each time. In only one race was he able to finish as good as third, and so his earnings for 1930 when he paraded to the post for the Travers amounted to only $125. As a juvenile he won two of nine starts, earning $14,945.

The Travers victory, however, was not unexpected by his owner and trainer, for the son of Jim Gaffney had been pointed for the Travers early this Spring. In fact, he was shipped across the continent from San Francisco early in June especially to run in the Travers. And according to Max A. Podlech, special passenger agent of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company, Trainer James B. McKee said as Jim Dandy boarded the car for his trip East, "Now you see the winner of the Travers. He will beat them all whether the track is fast or muddy."

After his disappointing races at Agua Caliente last Winter, Jim Dandy was taken to Tanforan, a race track twelve miles from San Francisco, and there Trainer McKee rested the colt, and then began a long and careful preparation which was climaxed in the stunning triumph yesterday.

Jim Dandy made the trip to Saratoga with Naishapur, a 4-year-old, which ran second to Clyde Van Dusen in the 1929 Kentucky Derby, and a pony. And they traveled in a luxurious fashion that few horses have experienced. The average horse car provides for twelve horses, but this pair had a car to themselves, the compartments being taken down, extra padding provided and other unusual provision made for their comfort and safety.

But even these arrangements did not satisfy Trainer McKee, and he insisted that the trip be made in as short a time as possible regardless of the expense, a policy to which Mr. Earl agreed. As a result the Santa Fe Railroad finally consented to attach a horse car to the California Limited, a crack flier from San Francisco to Chicago, for the first time.

With other time-saving arrangements, Jimy Dandy and Naishapur made the trip from San Francisco in six hours less than four days, a saving of approximately eighteen hours. The shipping cost was about $1,800 instead of a little more than $200 in the ordinary way.

BOUT WITH FLOWERS WILL TEST SUAREZ

Argentine Lightweight Will Meet Grogan's Conqueror Tuesday at Queensboro.

LEVINSKY IN A COME-BACK

Veteran Heavyweight Will Make Return to Ring Against Ubaldo at Henderson's Bowl.

By JAMES P. DAWSON.

Whether Justo Suarez, South American lightweight, warrants recognition as a prospective contender for the world's title now held by Al Singer is expected to be established Tuesday night.

The lad from the Argentine, confident in his success through two American ring trials, faces his third and most severe test when he tackles Bruce Flowers, rejuvenated New Rochelle Negro lightweight, in the stellar bout of ten rounds at the Queensboro Stadium.

Suarez conquered the rugged Joe Glick in his initial effort in this country, flooring the Williamsburgh lad several times in the course of their meeting, and followed this with a conquest of Herman Perlick, one of Kalamazoo's fighting twins. In these two matches the South American lad showed a refreshing style on the attack and established himself as a powerful puncher.

Flowers Still a Contender.

When he tackles Flowers, however, he will experience a brand of opposition different from what he encountered in either of his two previous American matches. Flowers is a shifty, clever boxer and proved by his spectacular one-round knockout of Tommy Grogan recently that he must still be reckoned among the leading lightweights.

Ben Jeby, rugged east side middleweight, is to battle Joey LaGray of the west side in the semi-final of eight rounds. In three six-round events the principals will be: Allie Wolff vs. Milton Hutner, Pee Wee Jarrell vs. Danny Levine, Leo Dazzo vs. Sid Reisler.

DeCarlos to Meet Mays.

The return of Battling Levinsky, veteran Philadelphian heavyweight, to the ring will be celebrated tomorrow night at Henderson's Bowl, Coney Island. A top-notch boxer when most of the present-day crop of fighters were in swaddling clothes, Levinsky returns to the wars to battle Primo Ubaldo, Gus Wilson's Italian heavyweight, in a ten-round bout.

The contest is billed as the semifinal to the feature which will introduce Armando DeCarlos, Italian heavyweight title claimant, against Harold Mays of Bayonne, for ten rounds. Billy Kohut, local middleweight, and Frank Boja, German, are scheduled for the first ten-round event. A six-round bout and a four-round preliminary complete the card.

Jeff Dickson, European promoter on a visit here, is negotiating for his second match. The promoter, who has established himself in London and Paris, has signed Al Brown, recognized bantamweight champion, to battle Eugene Huat, the French lad who is the European champion, fifteen rounds in Paris on Oct. 4, and is seeking now to induce Jack (Kid) Berg, National Boxing Association 140-pound champion, to consent to defend his title against Al Foreman in London.

Seaton Pippin Wins Best Award at Newport; Saddle Horse Title to Likely Lady

BEST HORSE AWARD TO SEATON PIPPIN

Gains Possession of Highwayman Cup by Second Successive Triumph at Newport.

LIKELY LADY WINS TITLE

Carries Off Saddle Horse Honors—Vice President Curtis and Governor Case Attend.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWPORT, R. I., Aug. 16.—For the second year in succession the Highwayman Cup, emblematic of the grand championship of the Newport Horse Show, today was captured by Seaton Pippin, the bay hackney mare owned by the Seaton Hackney Farm of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Moore of Morristown, N. J.

This afternoon's victory in the crowning event of the thirty-fourth annual exhibition gave permanent possession of the beautiful trophy to Mr. and Mrs. Moore.

Seaton Pippin's success was considered almost a certainty after her winnings in previous classes, although it was thought that the famous saddle champion, Likely Lady, owned by Miss Jane Bancroft of Cohasset, Mass., might press her closely for the highest honors of the show. There was no reserve ribbon in this event.

Two days of judging were crowded into one, yesterday's storm having necessitated a postponement of all classes on the second day's card. The double program brought out one of the largest assemblages that has ever witnessed Newport's annual event.

The show was honored by the presence of many distinguished personages, notably the Vice President of the United States, Charles Curtis, and Governor Norman S. Case of Rhode Island.

Seaton Pippin Is Consistent.

Seaton Pippin's victory in the Highwayman Cup followed her championship honors in the title event for single harness horses, in which she was placed over the Killearn Farm's chestnut mare Capenor King's Signal.

Likely Lady scored her third blue ribbon in as many times out when she won for Miss Bancroft in the class for park hacks, in which five competed against her. As before, Lewis A. Park's Christmas Morning was second, while third was the Green Hill Farm's bay gelding Peacock.

Princeonward, the veteran chestnut gelding, shown by William H. Vanderbilt of Oakland Farm, was the outstanding saddle horse of the larger division and accounted for his fourth blue ribbon of the exhibition when he was placed first in the class for saddle geldings over 14.3 hands, scoring over the Green Hill Farm's bay gelding, Peacock, and Miss Bancroft's Al Jolson, among others.

Having taken the open jumping event the first day, Webster Knight 2d's big chestnut gelding Clonmel came back this afternoon to carry off the honors in the touch-and-out. This was speedily decided, as few of the entries were able to get over the course even once. Second went to Leonard S. Chace's roan mare Irish Rose.

In the next eevnt, another open jump, Clonmel outscored all competitors for the Providence Sportsman trophy, outjumping Clifford W. Higham's chestnut gelding Lucky and Hugh Bancroft Jr.'s black mare Cinderella.

Upperland Gains Title.

Championship honors among the hunters went to the Upperland Farm of Byron W. Anthony of South Framingham, Mass., with his brown gelding, Upperland, while that for harness ponies went to that grand little brown gelding, Star Shot, owned by Mrs. Richard J. Goodman, Hartford, Conn.

Likely Lady, of course, took the honors among the saddle horses, while the rosette among the saddle ponies fell to the chestnut mare, Treasure Box, owned by F. Harold Tolman, also of Cohasset.

As on the opening day, the historic London-Brighton coach Venture, with William H. Vanderbilt tooling his spanking team, carried off the blue ribbon. His second coach took the red, third going to Mrs. Vanderbilt Church's four and fourth to Webster Knight 2d of Providence.

As generally expected, that great champion, Likely Lady, captured the sweepstakes for saddle horses, being placed over Lewis A. Park's chestnut mare Christmas Morning.

First place in the sweepstakes for hunters was gained by Hugh Bancroft Jr. of Cohasset, Mass., with his bay gelding Show me, the same owner winning third with his black mare, Cinderella. Second went to the Upperland Farm's bay mare Shannon Lass.

Mrs. Paul Moore drove her Seaton Hackney Farm's brown mare Seaton Mistletoe and brown gelding Seaton Rags to victory in the class for harness pairs over 14.2 hands, ladies handling the ribbons, while Mrs. Richard J. Goodman held the lines over the Killearn Farm's pair of bay mares Killearn Magic and Killearn Primrose.

GREENBERG WINS DECISION.

Triumphs Over Scalza in Main Bout at New Ridgewood Grove.

Ruby Greenberg, Williamsburg lightweight, received the decision over Dick Scalza, neighborhood rival, in the feature six-round bout last night at the New Ridgewood Grove. Greenberg weighed 132 pounds, and Scalza 132½.

In the six-round semi-final, Tommy Syracuse, 139 pounds, Yorkville, pounded out a decision over Herman Waters, 137, east side. Jimmy Jerome, Greenpoint featherweight, outpointed Jackie Kress, east side, in another six-rounder.

Lew Faden, 124 pounds, Brownsville, knocked out Johnny Rosenbloom, 128½, also of Brownsville, in the first round of a schedule four-round contest. In other four-rounders, Herman Stern outpointed Joe Catti, Joe Barra defeated Joe Grecco, Patsy Ferrara stopped Charley Gordonski in the final round and Billy De Janis knocked out Henry Rolufs in the first round.

New Gates at Baker Field, Costing $25,000, Will Be Completed During Football Season

New main gates, costing $25,000, will be completed at Baker Field this Fall and Columbia's attractive athletic headquarters is expected to be further beautified by this gift from the class of 1905.

Construction of the new gates is now under way and probably will be completed before the football season gets very far advanced. The occasion of the gift is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the class of 1905. The new gates will be on 218th Street opposite Seaman Avenue and will merely replace the gates which have been there since the enlarged Baker Field was opened two years ago.

The Reunews, reunion publication of the class, describes the gates as follows:

"These gates, about 58 feet long, 9 feet high at the centre and 15 feet at the highest point, are to be placed at the main entrance to Baker Field on 218th Street. The composition is to be a modern version of modified eighteenth century monumental English wrought iron work. The design consists of six large, hinged sections and six stationary pylons with overhead arches at two points. The end pylons are surmounted by king's crowns and the inserts below represent track sports.

"On each side of the large circles are Columbia lions cast in gray lead, with bronze figures below representing field sports. Over the circles are two more crowns with the numerals of the class, 1905, all in wrought iron, and below in the centre are blue and white enameled seals of the university.

"The centre gates carry gilded figures of cast bronze representing Football and Baseball, with Baker Field in gilt letters at the top. The conception and design are the creation of Harrison Gill, a former Columbia student.

"The remodeling of the grand stand behind the gates is being designed by Howard M. Peck, Columbia, 1905, and will form a dignified background with a restrained classic atmosphere, to be executed in a buff-colored stucco. In large letters on the stucco will appear Columbia University—Baker Field—1905-1930."

HORSE EXHIBITORS FACE BUSY WEEK

Malone Show, Opening Tomorrow, and Derby Event, Beginning Wednesday, on Card.

LAKE PLACID ENTERS FIELD

Thirty-six Classes on Club's First Two-Day Competition—Darien Classic Also Listed.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

For the remaining days of this month there are many opportunities for exhibitors and their friends who follow the horse show circuit. In fact, conflicts in dates continue, although this week, fortunately, the exhibitions in this section are far enough apart and cater to their own localities largely, so that none is likely to suffer.

A number of stables from considerable distances ship each year to Malone, N. Y., for the exhibition, which will open tomorrow and continue through Friday. Then there is the Derby horse show, which starts Wednesday and finishes out the week. This is one of the most attractive fixtures on the Summer circuit, being held under the auspices of the Lake Shore Hunt Club at Derby, N. Y., twenty miles from Buffalo. Derby attracts the hunting crowd, and the more than a hundred classes in the prize list have a preponderance of events for the hunters and jumpers.

The event nearest New York is the fourth annual horse show of the Ox Ridge Hunt Club, which will be held on the grounds of the club at Darien, Conn., next Saturday. This exhibition draws largely from members of the club, from the Fairfield County Club and other hunting sections in near-by New York and Connecticut.

This year sixteen of the twenty-six classes have been devoted to the saddle horses and an effort has been made to build up this division, since there is always an abundance of competition among the hunters and jumpers at Ox Ridge. Herbert L. Camp of Middletown, Conn., will judge the saddle classes. Hunters and jumpers will be picked by Edward H. Carle of Smithtown, L. I., and Dr. A. C. Randolph of Bluemont, Va., while Earl Hopping will pass on the polo mounts.

Lake Placid Show Opens Friday.

A new venture in the horse show world will make its début this week, the Lake Placid horse show coming Friday and Saturday under the auspices of the Lake Placid Riding Club. Thirty-six classes are on the premium list, and the classification should appeal to members of the club and the Summer residents at the various resorts in that section. Richard V. Look of Montreal will judge the horses and ponies under saddle; J. Garner West of Garnerville, N. Y., will take the hunters and jumpers. Seven events have been arranged for the New York State troopers, and these will be judged by Major George F. Chandler of Kingston, N. Y.

Prize lists have been sent out for the twenty-eighth annual Mineola horse show, to be held at the show grounds at Mineola on Sept. 10, 11 and 12. Sixty-nine classes are in the book, with twelve breeding classes, three for roadsters, four for ponies in harness, a runabout class and two combination events.

Saddle ponies will have two classes and a crampionship, and the Good Hands Cup, again will be in competition, while polo mounts have six classes.

Among the events for saddle horses will be the Sturgis Cup, valued at $200 and presented by the breeding bureau of the Jockey Club. There also will be a $250 saddle horse stake and two championship competitions, a $250 hunter and jumper stake and a championship for this division.

Carl S. Burr of Commack, L. I., will judge the trotters and breeding classes. Mrs. John Gerken of Brooklyn will pass on saddle horses and saddle ponies. Polo mounts will be judged by J. Watson Webb of New York and Carlton F. Burke of Los Angeles, while hunters and jumpers will be scored by Clarence H. Robbins of Bayshore, L. I. Entries will close on Monday, Aug. 25.

Show Rings Need Care.

Keeping a horse show ring in condition for three or four days under the constant pounding of the saddle horses and the cutting hoofs of the hunters and jumpers is one of the most difficult problems of horse show managements. Unfortunately, the centre of the ring, which is little used, cannot be moved bodily and laid down around the circle.

Dust was the difficulty in the early Summer, and Stamford solved its special difficulties by the application of peat moss. Watering lays dust temporarily. One difficulty seems to be a nice adjustment of drainage, since a ring that is not well drained becomes flooded with anything more than a shower.

Rumson had its especial problem in that there was a serious shortage of water in the town's suuply and this had to be conserved. It was noticed, however, that while the field was baked hard there was not nearly the dust that was so unpleasant at some other events. It is possible that the turf on the Rumson field was tougher than at other places. Possibly a study of grasses and the growing of a turf made up of deep-rooted, tough and creeping grasses would eliminate much of the trouble.

The exhibition of the 102d Cavalry, the Essex Troop, next Saturday should prove of interest to Jersey folk. This will be the organization's first outdoor show and it will be staged on the grounds of Boxwood Farm, the estate of William Buchsbaum at Spring Lake, N. J.

There will be only one session, with fifteen classes to be disposed of during the afternoon, the program to start at 1:30 and conclude at 6 P. M. There are classes for saddle horses, polo mounts, hunters and jumpers, officers' chargers, troopers' mounts and children's events.

For variety there will be three races on the card. There will be one event for polo mounts against time, a quarter-mile dash for enlisted men of the 102d Cavalry and a steeplechase for civilians and officers.

Fachieri's English-Bred Polo Pony Scores at East Hampton Horse Show.

GUN DANCE WINS RESERVE

Mrs. Duryea's Entry Also Annexes Three Blues—Say When Takes Open Jumping Prize.

Special to The New York Times.

EAST HAMPTON, L. I., Aug. 16.—The East Hampton Riding Club's sixth annual horse show today brought A. P. Fachieri's English-bred pony, Kilbride, to the front. After defeating the rival polo mounts, including William M. Duryea's Forty Days and May Hope, Kilbride went on to capture the John Drew Memorial trophy for the best horse or pony in the show.

Reserve ribbon went to Mrs. William M. Duryea's new chestnut mare Sun Dance, which Mrs. Duryea recently purchased from J. J. McDonald, who had great success with the mare after bringing her East from Missouri.

The Duryea horses had a great day for, in all, they accounted for fourteen ribbons, a championship ribbon and a reserve in the best in show group. Included in the collection were seven blues, three seconds, two thirds and two fourths.

Sun Dance won three blues with victories in the side saddle class, saddle mares or geldings over 15.1 hands and ladies' saddles for mares or geldings over 14.1 hands. Say When, owned by Mr. Duryea, one of the best show jumpers on Long Island, captured the open jumping class from a field of forty-four, but much credit for his triumph should go to Willie Brennan, crack rider of Glen Head, L. I., whose easy hands and heavy riding won the blue for Say When and third and fourth awards for Andrew J. Thomas's entries, Kinnegad and Glenwood.

Miss Rosemary Ward of East Hampton turned in a fine exhibition when she won the touch-and-out sweepstakes over a large field of professional and amateur riders with her brown gelding Boy Friend.

Pirates Win Second Game on Kremer's Pitching After Losing Opener to Robins

ROBINS TOP PIRATES, THEN LOSE NIGHTCAP

Kremer Blanks Brooklyn Until Final Inning to Win, 6-2, After Team Bows, 7-5.

MOSS RELIEVES ELLIOTT

Yields Only Four Hits From Fourth Until Eighth Frame of Opener—Suhr, Sothern Get Homers.

By ROSCOE McGOWEN.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Aug. 16.—The Robins found no improvement in conditions on the Western baseball front today, their best efforts bringing only an even break in the double-header with the Pirates.

They were able to defeat a young left-hander, Charley Wood, recent Pirate acquisition, in the first game, principally because of his early lack of control, but Remy Kremer chalked up his sixteenth seasonal triumph in the nightcap. The scores were 7 to 5 and 6 to 2.

Ray Moss, who relieved Jim Elliott and was in turn replaced by Watson Clark in the ninth, received credit for winning the first game, while Hollis Thurston was charged with the loss of the second.

Among the eight safeties off Thurston was a long home run by Gus Suhr. Denny Sothern hit over the left field wall off Elliott in the opener.

About 10,000 persons, one of the largest Saturday crowds of the season here, saw the game.

Charley Wood, youthful southpaw from the Wichita Club of the Western League, who joined the Pirates last night, started the first-game activities for the Robins by walking Gilbert, Herman and Moore in a row and then getting nicked for a triple by Glenn Wright.

Pittsburgh Bunches Hits.

This lead was not enough, however, as Denny Sothern, lead-off man, welcomed Jim Elliott with a home run over the score board in left field and, after the next two men were retired, Traynor, Grantham and Bartell lashed out consecutive singles to score a second run.

In the third the Pirates went one run ahead on Paul Waner's single, Traynor's sacrifice, a triple by Grantham off the right field wall and a single by Bartell. Meanwhile, Wood had regained some measure of control and held the Robins scoreless until the fifth.

In that frame the Robins fell upon Wood for four runs, garnered on singles by Moore, Wright, Bressler and Finn and Moss's sacrifice fly. A walk to Herman, the eighth pass handed out by Wood, started the inning.

Moss, who replaced Elliott at the start of the fourth, gave only four hits, but was scored on once when Comorosky opened with a triple and came home on Traynor's sacrifice fly. Wood held the Robins from the fifth until the eighth when he went out for a pinch hitter. Bernard Walter, young right-hander, set the Robins down in order in the ninth.

For eight innings Kremer had the Robins stopped in the second game, scattering only five hits among them and always retiring at least one man, and usually two, before the hit was made. Going into the ninth with a six-run lead, however, he apparently eased up, and Moore, Wright and Lopez promptly rifled singles past him to centre to score the first Brooklyn run.

Flowers Hits Into Double Play.

Bressler was unable to follow up and forced Lopez at second, but Wright scored on the play to complete the Robins' scanty total. Flowers ended the rally and game when he grounded to Bartell for a double play.

The most prodigious blow of the game was struck by Babe Herman in the sixth when he caught one of Kremer's slants fairly and rattled it off the most distant part of the centre-field wall. It rebounded and was handled so quickly by Lloyd Waner that Herman got only a double on the wallop.

Consecutive singles by Traynor, Bartell and Suhr sent the Pirates away to a two-run lead on Thurston in the second inning. In the fourth, Suhr's home run into the upper right-field stands with Bartell on added two more.

The final two were scored off Dudley in the eighth on a pass, a sacrifice and singles by Traynor and Bartell. At this point Dudley was removed and Elliott, starter of the opener, came in to quell the Pirates.

BERGER'S HIT WINS FOR BRAVES IN 8TH

Single Follows Clark's Safety and Wild Pitch, Giving Boston 6 to 5 Triumph.

LOSERS TIE COUNT IN 5TH

Score Once After Getting Four Runs in Fourth—Bob Smith Gives St. Louis Eleven Drives.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Aug. 16.—The Braves shaded the Cardinals, 6 to 5, today, bunching nine of their twelve hits with two wild pitches to score their runs.

The Cardinals got eleven hits off Bob Smith, and after trailing, 5 to 0, they tied the score with four unearned runs in the fourth, and a clean run in the fifth, but Boston won in the eighth on Clark's scratch hit, a wild pitch by Grabowski and Berger's single.

Grabowski pitched the last five innings for St. Louis, relieving Rhem, who hurled the first four.

NEWARK'S RALLY EFFECTIVE

Five Runs in 8th Beat Montreal, 6-1—Cohen's Homer Helps.

A five-run rally in the eighth inning broke up a pitching duel between Jess Petty and Walter Brown at Newark yesterday and gave the Bears a 6-1 victory over Montreal in the opening game of the series. Andy Cohen's home run aided in the decisive rally.

After five scoreless innings, Petty weakened momentarily in the sixth when he mishandled Haines's infield single and allowed the batter to reach third, from where he scored on Calleran's squeeze play. The Bears tied the count in the seventh when Hargreaves's double brought in Loepp, who had walked.

Hits by Windle, Barrett, Loepp and Cohen, and a walk to Thomas accounted for the decisive five runs in the eighth.

Petty struck out nine visiting batsmen and allowed only five hits, while Brown permitted only three safeties, with the exception of the fatal eighth.

CUBS WIN 1ST GAME, DEADLOCK SECOND

Triumph Over Phillies in 9th by 10 to 9—Darkness Halts Nightcap in 11th.

WILSON GETS 41ST HOMER

Chicago, Trailing 3-0 in Last Inning of Final Game, Ties Score on English's Wallop.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Aug. 16.—The league-leading Cubs and the last place Phillies staged a pair of thrilling games at Wrigley Field today, the Cubs winning the first, 10 to 9, in the ninth and the second being called at the end of the eleventh with the score tied at 3 and 3.

In the first game Hack Wilson made his forty-first home run of the season.

The Phils scored eight runs in the seventh inning of the opener to give them a lead of 9 to 8, but in the ninth Hartnett drove in the winning run.

Despite the fact the Phils made only two hits in the second game they were leading, 3 to 0, when the Cubs came to bat in the ninth. Stephenson, pinch hitting, opened with a single. Beck ran for him. Farrell walked. Hartnett sacrificed Beck to third. After Blair had popped to Thompson, a balk by Willoughby permitted Beck to score. English then drove the ball into the right field bleachers, scoring Farrell ahead of him and tieing the score. Darkness halted the game in the eleventh.

JONES OF SENATORS WINS MOUND DUEL

Washington Veteran Bests Uhle of Tigers, Mates Winning by 3 to 1.

MANUSH HALTS A RALLY

With Bases Filled, Makes Great One-Hand Catch of Desautels's Fly for Third Out.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 16.—The veteran Sam Jones bested another veteran, George Uhle, today in something of a pitching duel, Washington winning from Detroit by the score of 3 to 1.

Neither side tallied for three innings, but in the fourth Heinie Manush connected for a double to left and scored from second on West's single.

Detroit threatened in the sixth when Stone and Easterling walked after Alexander had doubled, but Manush halted the rally by making a beautiful running one-hand catch of Desautels's long fly for the third out of the inning, with the bases were loaded.

Washington added another run in the sixth when Cronin walked, went to second on Kuhel's single and scored on West's hit to right field.

Detroit scored in the eighth, Gehringer doubling to open the inning, taking third on a passed ball and scoring on Easterling's single.

In the eighth Hadley replaced Jones and retired the side. Kuhel singled to open the Washington eighth, Sammy West scoring him with a triple to centre.

BASEBALL TITLE AT STAKE.

Crescent, Montclair, Penn A. C. to Play for Club Crown.

A two-game play-off series for the Eastern Athletic Club Baseball League championship will be held next month, according to an announcement by Edmund W. Butler, president of the league.

In the first game on Sept. 6, the Cresmcent A. C. will meet the Montclair A. C. at Montclair, and on the following Saturday, Sept. 13, the winner will oppose the Penn A. C. at the home grounds of the Sept. 6 victor.

At the end of the regular playing season, the Crescent A. C., Penn A. C. and Montclair A. C. nines finished in a tie for first place, each with five victories and three defeats. The New York A. C., last year's winner, closed the campaign with four triumphs in its eight league games and the Englewood Field Club followed with one victory and seven setbacks.

RAIN HALTS YANKS IN FOURTH INNING

Series Opener With White Sox at Stadium Interrupted by Thunderstorm.

PITCHING DUEL TERMINATED

Ruffing and Thomas in Scoreless Battle—Two Clubs Play Double Bill Today.

By WILLIAM E. BRANDT.

The scheduled opening game of the Yankees' last local series of the season with the Chicago White Sox yesterday went as far as the fourth inning and was developing into a neat pitching duel when a thunderstorm dropped in at the Stadium and held the centre of the stage for half an hour.

Just as the rain stopped and the sun began peeping down on 10,000 fans, the umpires sent word that the game was called on account of wet grounds. As a result, a double-header will be on view this afternoon between the same two teams.

Our Charlie Ruffing and their Alphonse Thomas were the contestants in the incipient twirling tussle. Combs and Ruth hit singles in the first inning, but Lazzeri's liner over first base was clutched by Clancy for an unassisted double play. He caught the liner with his foot on the bag and with Ruth two steps away from it.

The Sox made two hits off Ruffing, but in separate innings. The rain started falling just after Jolley singled with one out in the fourth. Ruffing had two strikes on the next batter, Watwood, when Umpire Geisel called a halt and sent the athletes scurrying for shelter.

Bill Dickey was in the Yankee line-up, starting a game for the first time since he had his finger bumped by a foul tip on Aug. 5. Another interesting line-up change was the appointment of Dusty Cooke to start the game in centre field in place of Harry Rice, who is in a batting slump, having made only one hit in his last fourteen times at bat.

JERSEY CITY WINS IN 9TH.

Rochester Hurler Forces Winning Run Home—Score Is 6-5.

Jersey City rallied to score two runs in the ninth and defeat Rochester in the opening game of the series at West Side Park, Jersey City, last night. The score was 6 to 5, Tex Carleton forcing in Kessey on a walk with the bases filled.

MACKMEN RALLY IN 7TH

Haas's Single, McNair's Double and Cochrane's Single Provide Winning Lead.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 16.—Lefty Grove gained his twentieth victory of the season today in helping the Athletics to beat St. Louis, 4 to 2, in the opening game of the final home series with the Browns.

Grove and Coffman hooked up in a pitchers' battle, the former allowing ten hits and the latter nine.

With the score tied at 2—2 in the seventh, the league leaders won on Haas's single to right, McNair's two-bagger and Mickey Cochrane's single to left. Two were out when the Mackmen started the winning spurt.

Coffman opened the seventh for St. Louis with a two-bagger and advanced to third on Blue's sacrifice fly, but when the St. Louis pitcher tried to score on a short passed ball Cochrane nailed him at the plate on a toss to Grove.

GIANTS SWEEP ON, BEATING REDS TWICE

By JOHN DREBINGER.

the third on Gooch's triple, a pass, Callaghan's sacrifice fly and singles by Stripp and Cuccinello.

Giants Win in First.

The Giants virtually tore the opener to shreds in the very first round when they belabored Ray Kolp and Kenneth Ash for eight hits to roll up a total of seven runs. The first of these tallies was scored when Critz larruped the second pitch of the game to left centre and continued on his way home when Durocher tossed the relay into the Cincinnati dugout.

Then followed singles by Lindstrom and Terry, a sacrifice fly by Ott, another pair of singles by Hogan and Jackson and a double by Roettger. This finished Kolp, and Ash came on to be greeted by a pair of doubles by Fitzsimmons and Critz, the latter getting his second extra base hit of the inning.

Subsequently Critz got two more hits in this game, which did not induce the good Cincinnatians to think any more highly of the deal that sent Hughie to New York than they have in the past.

This blazing start made it a comparatively simple task for Fitzsimmons to keep the Reds far in the ruck. He allowed them only five hits and declined to pass a single man. In the seventh the Reds passed out on four pitched balls and in the eighth on five. As three is par for the course it can easily be seen the Reds were close to perfection.

National Title Track and Field Meet to Open in Pittsburgh Friday

A. A. U. TITLE MEET TO OPEN ON FRIDAY

National Junior and Senior Championships to Be Decided at Pittsburgh.

STRONG FIELDS EXPECTED

Sensational Performances of Leading Contenders Indicate Keen Rivalry in 3-Day Event.

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

With a season of sensational performances behind them, athletes of the nation will assemble at Pittsburgh on Friday, Saturday and a week from tomorrow for the annual A. A. U. national championships, which will have its final chapter written at Soldier Field, Chicago, a week from Wednesday, in the dual engagement between the United States and British Empire teams.

In the course of the last campaign two world's records have been surpassed, two more equaled, and right down the line the competition has been so keen and productive of exceptional feats that such items as a 100-yard dash of 0:09.6, the former universal standard, fails to be mentioned among the five best centuries of the year.

The two outstanding achievements are the 0:09.4 hundred of Frank Wykoff of the University of Southern California and the discus throwing of Eric Krenz of Stanford. The blond-haired Wykoff twice hit 0:09.4, touched 0:09.5 once, 0:09.6 three times, 0:09.7 thrice and 0:09.8 twice to keep below even time for a full season of the most stirring sort.

Krenz Has Brilliant Record.

The black-haired Krenz, defending champion in the discus and world's record holder with the mark of 163 feet 8¾ inches, turned in the following performances: 167 feet 5⅝ inches, 163 feet 8 inches, 162 feet 10½ inches, 161 feet 7⅝ inches, 161 feet ½ inch and 160 feet 9¾ inches. Krenz is expected to defend his laurels, but the same certainly is not connected with the possibility of Wykoff attempting the regain the honors he lost to Eddie Tolan, Michigan Negro, a year ago. The former Glendale High School boy announced some time ago that he was through for the season, but pressure has been exerted to cause him to alter his decision.

In addition to these two accomplishments of world's record dimensions there is also the standard-equaling feat of long-legged Steve Anderson of Washington, the National A. A. U. and National Collegiate A. A. hurdling king. Anderson duplicated the time-honored standard of Earl Thomson in the 120-yard high hurdles with a sensational 0:14.4 performance.

George Simpson of Ohio State, hailed a year ago as the world's fastest human, tied Roland Locke's record of 0:20.6 for the furlong.

Many Sensational Performances.

Then, too, we have such near-record accomplishments as Pete Bowen's 0:48 quarter, Russell Chapman's 1:52.2 half mile, Ralph Hill's 4:12.4 mile, Lee Bentman's 0:23.2 low hurdles race, Bob Van Osdel's 6 feet 7¼ inch high jump, while four other performers were better than 6 feet 5 inches; three 25-foot broad jumps, twenty-two 13-foot pole vaulters, four hammer throwers over 160 feet, five shot-putters over 50 feet, with Herman Brix, defending titleholder, surpassing the existing record in an exhibition and missing it by three-quarters of an inch in actual competition; eight javelin throwers over 200 feet and three discuss throwers over the former world's record of 158 feet 1¼ inches.

There, indeed, is a season of phenomenal achievement!

Of the twenty champions who were crowned a year ago, the only one who may not defend their crows are Phil Edwards of British Guiana, Canada, and New York University, in the 880; Leo Lermond of the Boston A. A. in the mile, and Dave Abbott of the Illinois A. C., in the 2-mile steeplechase. The rest are expected to be at hand, but no definite word is available as yet.

And so brilliant are the fields anticipated to be, especially since sixty will be picked from performances over the week-end to represent the United States at Chicago, that all will be hard put to retain their laurels.

Fast Sprint Field Expected.

In the sprints Tolan will be faced by Simpson, Cy Leland of Texas Christian, Claude Bracey of Rice Institute, Emmett Toppino of Loyola in New Orleans, Hec Dyer of Stanford, Russ Sweet of the Olympic Club, Les Hables of Stanford, and possibly Wykoff and Hubert Meier of Iowa State, who traversed the century in 0:09.4 with the aid of starting blocks, and a dozen other men capable of better than even time.

Bowen in the quarter will be challenged by Ben Eastman, Stanford freshman; Johnny Morrison of Stanford and, perhaps, Charlie Engle of Yale. Bowen, incidentally, is one of the most versatile runners in the country. Some indication of his versatility may be obtained by the mere fact that during the late indoor season he finished second in the Millrose 600 and second in the intercollegiate 70-yard dash.

In the mile there will be Ray Conger of the Illinois A. C., George Lermond of West Point and the New York A. C., Rufus Kiser of Washington, Joe Sivak of Butler, Gene Venzke of the Swedish-American A. C., Gus Moore of the Brooklyn Harriers and perhaps Ralph Hill of Oregon and Ray Swartz of Western State Teachers College.

Anderson Among Hurdle Entrants.

The twin hurdle races will bring together Anderson, Lee Sentman of Illinois, Jed Welsh, Bill Carls and Ernie Payne of Southern California, Bob Maxwell and Bill Edwards of the Olympic Club and other brilliant timber-toppers.

But of all the fields the pole vault is likely to have the highest class entry. Fred Sturdy of the Los Angeles A. C., who has had little outdoor competition this year, will face the greatly improved Tommy Warne of Northwestern, with nearly a dozen vaults this year over 13 feet 6 inches. At the meet at Denver a year ago all the place winners in junior and senior championships were over 13 feet for the first time in history. Even this is likely to be surpassed, and, furthermore, if conditions are right Warne may sail to a new world's record. He has missed 14 feet 2 inches on several occasions by hitting the bar with his arms after he had cleared it with his body.

Another brilliant duel is expected between big Herman Brix of the Los Angeles A. C. and Harlow Rothert of Stanford and the Olympic Club in the shot. Brix is just rounding into form and will undoubtedly be pressed to the utmost by the Cardinal star.

Krenz Defeated by Jessup.

Rothert's friend and team-mate, Krenz, who suffered defeat at the hands of the towering Paul Jessup of Washington in the National Collegiate meet, will be out to erase that only blot on his escutcheon over an entire year of competition.

The schedule of the games calls for the junior championships on Friday, the senior title meet on Saturday and the decathlon and relays on Monday. Pennsylvania blue laws will prevent any competition on Sunday.

The following is a list of the best five performances of the year in each event:

VICTORY BOATS TO RACE.

Will Meet Seawanhaka S Class In Team Event Today.

The Seawanhaka Corinthan S Class and the Victory boats will race today on Oyster Bay in a team match affair, each class being represented by four craft. The race is being sponsored by the Seawanhaka Corinthan Yacht Club and the yachts are scheduled to be sent away at 3 o'clock with the start off Oak Neck Point. The course itself will be announced from the committee boat just before the race.

It will be the third team race of the season for the Victory Class, which already has met and defeated representatives from the Sound Interclub and the Atlantic.

The race today will be followed with great interest by Corinthans, for it should afford keen competition. The Seawanhaka Corinthan Class was designed by Herreshoff, while the Victories are from the designs of William Gardner. Weather conditions are likely to be the determining factor, for in a fresh wind the S boats should have an advantage, while light weather should prove a boon to the Victories.

Coast Athletes Start East Today.

LOS ANGELES, Aug. 16 (AP).—The smallest but probably the most potent track and field squad in the history of the Los Angeles Athletic Club went through final paces today, before leaving tomorrow for Pittsburgh, where its coach, Dean Cromwell, has hopes of winning the national A. A. U. title.

KNOBLOCH ANNEXES ALL-AROUND TITLE

Wins Richmond County Track and Field Champinship With 3,289 Points.

GUS SYVERSON IS SECOND

Loses Ground In Mile Run to Finish 81 Points Behind Victor—Wolfe Third.

Eddie Knobloch of the New York A. C., former hurdling star at the University of Pittsburgh, won the Richmond County all-around track and field championship yesterday at Curtis High School athletic field in Staten Island.

Competing in six events—pole vault, high jump, 100-yard dash, broad jump, shot-put and one-mile run—Knobloch tallied 3,289 points to lead his nearest competitor, Gus Syverson of the Norwegian Turn Society, by the fairly close margin of 81 points.

Syverson lost a chance to gain ground in the one-mile run, final event on the program, when he was timed in 5:55 to Knobloch's 5:39:2. He lost 83 points in this one test. Lawton Wolfe of the Lincoln A. C., another contender, dropped 109 points to Knobloch in this race and finished third with 3,108 points.

THE SUMMARIES.

The Contestants—Ed Knobloch, N. Y. A. C.; Gus Syverson, Norwegian Turn Society; Lawton Wolfe, Lincoln A. C.; Harold Syverson, Norwegian Turn Society; Jerry Rocco, Lincoln A. DEULBERG WILL RIDE TONIGHT AT NEWARK

German Motor-Paced Star to Face Strong Field in 40-Mile Feature Event.

Franz Deulberg, sensational German motor-paced star, will have another chance to increase his lead tonight at the Newark Velodrome when he meets Alfred Letourner, Franco Georgetti, Charley Jaeger, George Chapman and Frank Keenan in a forty-mile grind. Deulberg has been impressive in recent races and many look for him to take the American title back to Germany.

Alfred Letourner and Franco Georgetti, leaders in the title race at present, are beginning to feel the strain of the pace the fast-riding German star has been setting these past few weeks. Charlie Jaeger, George Chapman and Frank Keenan also are expected to supply plenty of competition.

A five-mile event that will decide the American amateur title also will be a feature. This race has simmered down to a battle between Dominick Tuccello of the Acme Wheelmen and Edward Seufert of the Bay View Wheelmen.

Avanti Martinetti will oppose Charlie Ritter in a one-mile match race and Cecil Walker will meet Eddie Raffo in another one-mile test. Martinetti has lost to Ritter a few times before and he expects to turn the tables in this race.

W. AND J. ISSUES CALL.

Football Candidates Will Start Practice on Sept. 2.

WASHINGTON, Pa., Aug. 16.—Washington and Jefferson College varsity gridiron candidates, approximately thirty-five strong, will report to Head Coach Bill Amos on Tuesday, Sept. 2, to begin preliminary practice for the season, which will be featured by the Presidents meeting the Lafayette College athletes, whom they have met annually since 1922, in an indoor struggle at Atlantic City on Saturday, Oct. 25.

Coach Amos will be assisted by Pete Henry, former all-American star at W. & J. Neither will make any predictions regarding the coming season.

Some of the Red and Black athletes already are practicing.

A squad of more than thirty freshman athletes will report on Saturday, Sept. 25.

Junior Cue Test Set.

CHICAGO, Aug. 16 (AP).—A national junior pocket billiard championship match will be played for the first time in Chicago Aug. 27, 28 and 29. Robert Moore, 13, Grand Rapids, Mich., will oppose Charles Cacciapaglia, 12, Rockford, Ill. The test will be sponsored by the National Billiard Association of America.

15,000 HAIL START OF EMPIRE GAMES

By LINCOLN A. WERDEN.

tario, another speaker, addressing the athletes who stood at attention on the field before him, said that "nothing since the days of the war has demonstrated the bonds of empire and enthusiasm of our people in unity in action and spirit as this demonstration here."

Viscount Willingdon, Governor-General, then formally opened the games after extending a welcome to all competitors by saying "I now declare these sports and games open and I wish them all possible success."

In Viscount Willingdon's party in the vice regal box were Count Baillet Latour, president of the International Olympic Committee; E. W. Beatty, Sir Arthur Currie and the other prominent guests who arrived shortly before the march of the athletes began.

Two trumpeters of the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders stood at the west gate and gave the opening salute. Almost instantly another member of their regiment stepped through the gate into the stadium carrying a huge Union Jack and back of him came the athletes of the eleven countries, in the fashion of an Olympic parade, with a standard bearer at the head of each section.

Newfoundland, the oldest colony of the empire, headed the procession and then in order came Bermuda, British Guiana, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, Wales, Ireland (with one representative, since the other competitors have not reached here yet), Scotland, England and Canada.

Garbed in vari-colored blazers with the blue of the Englishmen contrasting with the cardinal of Canada, the green of Australia and South Africa and the black of New Zealand, the athletes formed an inspiring picture and those who traveled many miles to attend the event rose and cheered as the men and women marched round the quarter-mile track, saluted the Governor General and then took up their places on the field for the official opening ceremony.

Percy Williams, Canada's Olympic champion, who will only compete in the 100-yard dash, then stepped forward to take the oath for the assembled athletes. It was: "From many parts of the British Empire we are here assembled as amateur athletes to compete in friendly competition. We pledge our best endeavors to uphold the honor of our country and the glorious tradition of British sportsmanship."

Bombs fired back of the stadium and balloons with small Union Jacks tied to them were then set loose. Soon the attendants were setting up the hurdles for the first event on the long and varied athletic program that will culminate next Saturday.

Canadian Athlete Injured.

After the heats in the 440-yard hurdles, with Lord Burghley taking his rather easily, the first real bit of excitement came in the second heat of the 220 when Johnny Ball of Canada tumbled across the finish line back of William Walters of South Africa and cut his leg and shoulder.

South Africa placed W. J. Gerhardt in the final, while Canada also had its champion, Johnny Fitzpatrick. Ball was noticeably weakened by the incident and did not place. Englehart had the edge most of the way to lead Fitzpatrick by a little over a yard at the tape, Ball finishing fifth, back of Walters and Roy Hamilton of Scotland.

Phil Edwards made his appearance in the second heat of the 880, the finals of which will be held on Thursday, and he qualified back of Tom Hampson, the English champion, and H. S. Townsend, Hampson's time being 1:55 3-5.

Savidan was close to Shrubb's world's record time of 29:50 2-5, and he shot ahead of the field when Jimmy Wood of Scotland, after making one spurt after another, tired shortly after passing the four-mile mark.

Smallacombe's feat of 48 feet 5 inches lowered the Canadian mark of 47 feet 1½ inches by J. G. Macdonald that had been standing since 1908. Smallacombe, who holds the Canadian title for this event, led R. W. Revans of England, whose distance was 46 feet 10¾ inches and L. Hutton of Canada, getting his record on his second attempt in the final elimination.

THE SUMMARIES.

440-Yard Hurdles—Won by Lord Burghley, England; R. Leigh-Wood, England, second; D. M. L. Neame, England, third. Time—0:54 2-5 (new Canadian record; old record, 0:56 2-5, by W. J. Montabone, 1927).

220-Yard Dash—Won by S. E. Englehart, England; Johnny Fitzpatrick, Canada, second; W. J. Walters, South Africa, third; Roy Hamilton, Scotland, fourth. Time—0:21 4-5.

880-Yard Run (four men to qualify in each heat for final Thursday)—First heat—Won by J. H. Chandler, South Africa; R. H. Thomas, England, second; M. H. C. Gutteridge, England, third; P. Pickard, Canada, fourth. Time—1:51 4-5. Second Heat—Won by Tom Hampson, England; A. Wilson, Canada, second; Phil Edwards, British Guiana, third; H. S. Townsend, England fourth. Time—1:55 3-5.

Running Hop, Step and Jump—Won by Gordon Smallacombe, Canada, 48 feet 5 inches; R. W. Revans, England, 46 feet 10¾ inches, second; L. Hutton, Canada, 45 feet 7¼ inches, third; G. W. Sutherland, Canada, 45 feet 1⅛ inches, fourth; Gregory Power, Newfoundland, 44 feet 1¼ inches, fifth; R. O. Johnson, New Zealand, 43 feet 2 inches, sixth. (New Canadian record; old record, 47 feet 1½ inches, by J. G. MacDonald, 1908.)

Six-Mile Run—Won by W. J. Savidan, New Zealand; E. Harper, England, second; T. Evenson, England, third; James F. Wood, Scotland, fourth; R. R. Sutherland, Scotland, fifth; W. Reynolds, Canada, sixth. Time—30:49 3-5 (new Canadian record; old record, 32:58, made by Reynolds, 1930).

Dennison Wins Net Title.

SHARON, Pa., Aug. 16 (AP).—Carl Dennison, Youngstown, Ohio, won the Northeastern Pennsylvania tennis singles championship today by defeating Howard Cooper, Youngstown, 6—2, 3—6, 7—5, 6—1.

Radi-o-ing Man Style

Robt. Burns Panatela for Smoking
Guy Lombardo's Orch.
for Rhythm

Every Robt. Burns Panatela Program—to be heard each Monday evening over the Columbia Broadcasting System—carries a message of MAN STYLE in smoking.

In the incomparable dance tempo of Guy Lombardo's Royal Canadians, as in the long, graceful Robt. Burns Panatela, men find something strikingly pleasing to them.

Jaunty yet genteel, the style cigar looks just right with the chap who gives a thought to refinement. Its distinctive look makes good in the fragrant mildness of clear Havana filler—flavory without the crack of strong tobacco.

Tune in on the next Robt. Burns Panatela Program, and lighting the long, ingratiating cigar, turn the romantic melody of Guy Lombardo into aromatic charm.

Chinook Victor in Forty-Foot Class at Port Washington Yacht Club Regatta

WHITNEY'S CHINOOK SAILS HOME FIRST

Beats New York Y. C. 40-Foot Rivals in Port Washington Yacht Club Regatta.

HORNET WINS IN CLASS Q

Nymph and Istalena Other Victors—105 Boats Compete in Races on Sound.

Special to The New York Times.

PORT WASHINGTON, L. I., Aug. 16.—The annual open regatta of the Port Washington Yacht Club took place today on Long Island Sound off Execution Light with 105 craft competing.

Conditions varied throughout the afternoon and early evening so that the skippers were confronted with all kinds of wind and tidal influences. There was practically no wind at all when the first boats were sent away over the triangular courses.

A slight wind from the southeast sprang up later and made the first leg a beat to windward. The wind shifted around to northwest and then by degrees to southwest, but it was full of holes and offered no steady moving force for the competitors.

Brief Rainstorm Occurs.

A rainstorm came up a few minutes after the last boats got off, but it did not interfere with the boats to any great extent. The temporary result of the brief storm was that the Sound became more placid and some of the craft for a time remained in a rather stationary position.

Howard Whitney's Chinook came through to an impressive victory in the New York Yacht Club forty-foot class, winning from Mistral, owned by William B. Bell, by more than nine minutes. Grey Dawn, R. E. Fulton's Larchmont O entry, scored over Varuna in that class.

Hornet Wins in Class Q.

Hornet, owned by R. B. Strassburger, had nearly a sixteen-minute advantage over Mary, L. B. Marvin Jr.'s craft, in Class Q.

Nymph won in the eight-meter one-design class, defeating Roulette III by two minutes. In Class M. G. M. Pynchon's Istalena defeated C. D. Wiman's Simba, which failed to finish within the time limit.

Shawara gained a good lead in the New York Yacht Club forty-foot class, and was away well on the first leg, but Chinook was better at the other points of sailing and had no difficulty in winning.

4 U. S. Destroyers, 6 Planes To Escort the Shamrock V

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 16.—A naval escort of four destroyers and six airplanes has been assigned to the Shamrock V, British challenger for the America's Cup, on the occasion of her official arrival at Newport Harbor prior to the international yacht races, which begin Sept. 13. Members of the official welcoming committee will be aboard the escorting destroyers.

A request for the escort was made by race officials to Rear Admiral J. J. Raby, U. S. N., commanding Train Squadron 1, and senior officer present of naval forces afloat at Newport. The request was forwarded to the Navy Department and was approved here today.

STERLING'S YACHT SCORES.

Felicity Sails Home First in S Class at Oyster Bay.

Special to The New York Times.

OYSTER BAY, L. I., Aug. 16.—Light, shifting winds that made it exceedingly difficult for the fleet to negotiate an inside course were experienced by the yachtsmen of the Seawanhaka Corinthian Yacht Club today.

After bobbing about the bay for the greater part of the afternoon, Felicity, owned by D. Sterling Jr., managed to drift across the finish line winner in the S Class by 4 minutes 20 seconds from Senta, property of Daniel Bacon.

In the Jay Class the first home was Blue Jay, which belongs to T. Taylor.

Beats Rival Star Class Yachts in Race at Noroton.

Special to The New York Times.

NOROTON, Conn., Aug. 16.—Six Star Class boats competed today in the race of the Noroton Yacht Club. A light breeze blew out of the southwest as the boats started, but died away as they approached the windward mark.

John Nickerson Jr.'s Argo took the lead at the first mark and drifted home ahead of the others, with Mrs. Philip G. Lovell bringing her Terek home second, one minute thirty-four seconds behind.

SHIP WILL FOLLOW YACHTS.

Four Cruises From Boston to Newport Are Announced.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Aug. 16.—In connection with the international yacht races to be held off Newport in September, the Eastern Steamship Lines, Inc., is to operate four short cruises from Boston to Newport and return. These are scheduled for Sept. 12, 15, 17 and 19.

On Sept. 12 and 19 the steamer North Land will follow the yachts over the course and return to the anchorage at the close of the race. The steamer will remain in Newport harbor Saturday night, tender service being provided for those wishing to go ashore. On Sunday the ship will leave for Boston.

On Sept. 15 and 17 the North Land also will follow the yachts, then go to her anchorage. She will leave Newport harbor at 8 P. M., arriving in Boston the following morning.

WORK PROGRESSES ON THE SHAMROCK V

Temporary Derrick and Halyards Put in Place for Stepping Topmast Today.

HUNDREDS WATCH ACTIVITY

Two Sailmakers Arrive From England—Carpenter Repairs Damage to Stern.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW LONDON, Conn., Aug. 16.—At the Electric Boat Company's plant in Groton the work of rerigging the Shamrock V, Sir Thomas Lipton's America's Cup challenger, is progressing favorably, notwithstanding a heavy rain that put a crimp in operations for a couple of hours this morning.

At noon the gin-pole, a 50-foot spar, was hoisted to the top of the yacht's main mast and five of the shipyard riggers were engaged in shipping the stick through an iron band and lashing the pole securely to the mast.

At 5 o'clock this evening, when the riggers quit work for the day, the gin-pole, which is a temporary derrick, and halyards were in place and everything in readiness for tomorrow morning, when the racing topmast will be stepped.

Spectators Barred During Work.

As the work of the riggers in raising the gin-pole was of a dangerous nature, no spectators were allowed on the wharf, which was roped off.

The Shamrock V continued to be a veritable magnet and hundreds of visitors again were issued passes to enter the grounds at the shipyard office.

Scores of motor boats, some of them heavily laden with passengers, swarmed about the green-tinted yacht throughout the day, and the steamer Shinnecock, with a large crowd of Long Island excursionists, swerved from her regular course in midstream late this afternoon to give her passengers a close-up of the trim-looking racer.

Two Men Added to Squad.

Shortly after 4 o'clock this afternoon two more men were added to the Shamrock's racing squad. They arrived with baggage and were assigned quarters aboard the houseboat Killarney. One of the Shamrock's crew volunteered the information that the newcomers were experienced sailmakers arrived from Gosport, England, on the Leviathan.

While they will not have a hand in bending the Shamrock's canvas, they will be pressed into service should alterations be needed or the sails ripped.

The Shamrock's crew was still taking material out of the sloop's hold at a late hour this afternoon, the miscellaneous cargo being carefully stowed away on the Killarney, which luckily is a houseboat of unusual size.

Carpenter Repairs Stern.

The stern of the Shamrock was damaged while the yacht was racing on the Clyde and a ship carpenter spent the past two days replacing about a square foot of the stern with pieces of teakwood and mahogany. The sloop injured her nose by thrashing in heavy seas.

As the ways that will be used to haul the Shamrock out are still occupied, it is likely the yacht will not be hauled out before next Tuesday.

When she is placed in the water again she will have been scraped and polished and her body above the water-line repainted an emerald hue, with a gold streamline close to her gunwales. Breaking the streamline, close to the stern, is a four-leaf shamrock, occupying a space of about four square inches.

This emblem also is gilded and would seem to prove that Sir Thomas has a leaning to the superstition that the little plant, so beloved by the Irish race, is looked upon as a lucky omen.

SQUALL CAUSES YACHT TO CAPSIZE IN RACE

Two Blown Ashore and Another Sails on Bar Off Cedarhurst—Complex Wins.

Special to The New York Times.

CEDARHURST, L. I., Aug. 16.—A squall from the north smashed up the fleet of the Cedarhurst Yacht Club today, blowing two of the boats ashore, causing another to sail on a bar to avoid being capsized, and turned over another in mid-channel. While only three craft finished, all of the Corinthians were reported as being safe this evening.

The boat that was capsized was Pal, a sneak box, owned by L. Wyeth. The ones that were blown aground were No. 9 of the rater class, which is owned by N. Rathbone, and the sneak box O-omph, which belongs to J. Ballantine.

Complex won the rater class event. Flying Cloud was the only boat to finish among the sneak boxes.

RACES AT MARBLEHEAD PUT OFF UNTIL TODAY

Threatening Squalls and Light Airs Force Postponement of Final Corinthian Y. C. Event.

Special to The New York Times.

MARBLEHEAD, Mass., Aug. 16.—Threatening squalls, light airs, rain and a dubious southern horizon line forced the postponement of the final Corinthian Yacht Club midsummer races today at Marbehead.

Another great racing fleet turned out for the scheduled wind-up of the annual yachting classic with more than 125 boats of the larger classes drifting at the outside starting line. The races will be sailed tomorrow morning, with the first starting gun at 10 o'clock.

A heavy racing schedule is on the log all day. In addition to the big regatta, the regular Corinthian Yacht Club Sunday series and the Herreshoff S Class race for the Guy Lowell Memorial Cup will be sailed in the afternoon.

The Brutal Beasts, manned by the youngest skippers, were the only boats to sail and finish the midsummer series today. In a light southeast wind, the diminutive racing class was given a short harbor course up and back through the shipping. Wells Morss piloted the Bantam to a half-minute victory over Eric Shepard's Erne to capture the Corinthian trophy in Division 1. The four divisions finished in order with Elizabeth Watson's Wamsutta leading the second division home to lift another Corinthian trophy. Arthur J. Santry Jr.'s Blackbird headed the third division, with Anne Conant's Katydid taking the midsummer trophy.

The annual Pleon Bang and Go Back race brought out twenty-two power boats ranging from cruisers to outboards, with James Jones's launch Here Me beating Al Sweet's Runabout by two seconds.

SCHOETTLE'S LOTUS WINS YACHT TROPHY

Takes Toms River Challenge Cup in Race of Class A Catboats on Barnegat Bay.

TOMS RIVER, N. J., Aug. 16 (AP).—A light north wind skillfully utilized brought to the Island Heights Yacht Club and E. J. Schoettle the Toms River Challenge Cup, oldest trophy on the New Jersey Coast, and a victory in the Class A catboat race today on Barnegat Bay.

The Doan Cup, awarded in the sloop race, was won by C. M. Chance of Seaside Park in Scamp. J. H. Wurtz sailed to victory in the Class B catboat race, the concluding contest of the day.

The challenge cup, most coveted trophy of the Barnegat Bay Yacht Racing Association, was first sailed for in 1850 and is now in the custody of the Toms River Yacht Club as a perpetual trophy.

Light breezes scattered the boats over the eleven-mile course. Skippers scouted frantically for a stray puff. Light weather boats scored in every instance. Slow time was made in all contests.

The challenge cup race had six craft on the starting line, including 84-year-old Captain F. O. Bailey of Brielle, racing out of his usual class in an effort to take the trophy to the Bay Head Yacht Club.

Not until the second lap of the contest did Schoettle's seamanship put the Lotus ahead of Roy Weaver of Seaside Park, sailing the Tamwock. This lead was increased until the finish found Schoettle nearly five minutes ahead of his rival.

WASHINGTON CREWS LEAD.

SUNBEAM VICTOR AMONG STAR BOATS

Atwater Craft Leads Hennessy Home in Regatta of West Hampton Club.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST HAMPTON BEACH, L. I., Aug. 16.—The yacht squadron of the West Hampton Country Club encountered practically no wind when the fleet started its week-end regatta today, and as a result, the races were drifting matches in which many of the craft in the smaller classes found it exceedingly difficult to reach the finish line.

Interest centred in the Star Class, which brought eight craft to the starting line. The winner was W. C. and J. J. Atwater's Sunbeam, 1 minute and 30 seconds ahead of H. A. Libaire's Hennessy. In the Moriches Bay Class, the first home was A. Mark's Rhapsody. Then came H. L. Guterson's Shamarocke, 35 seconds astern.

Among the Indians, the first to finish was Cuyahoga, which is owned by W. Potts, with Pocahontas second by 9 minutes and 44 seconds. The first of the Shore Birds to finish was Red Head, the property of H. E. Post Jr.

ACTIVITY NOTED IN SUBURBAN RESIDENTIAL PROPERTIES

EVENTS OF THE WEEK IN THE REALTY FIELD

Light Metropolitan Trading Is Relieved by Activity in Apartment House Renting.

$1,500,000 DEAL DOWNTOWN

Survey of Six Months' Prices Shows Marked Decline in Manhattan Property Transfers.

Quiet conditions prevailed in the realty field throughout the metropolitan area last week. Both urban and suburban trading evinced little activity. The only apparent bright element, and that only in certain localities, was apartment house leasing for Fall occupancy, a renewal of renting interest being reported in the lower Fifth Avenue district, in the Central Park West locality and in some parts of the east side.

The weekly summary of The Record and Guide yesterday showed that, based on assessed valuations, realty conveyances in Manhattan fell approximately 31 per cent in July below the corresponding month last year.

"During July," says The Record and Guide's report, "there were 647 conveyances of Manhattan real property recorded, the assessed valuation being $100,703,175, as compared with 1,011 conveyances recorded in July, 1929, the assessed valuation being $146,619,800. This decline is greater than had been anticipated, as the difference for the first six months of this year as compared with the January-June period, 1929, was only approximately 20 per cent. That brokers' commissions fell precipitately during the last month is apparent."

Good Downtown Deal.

Lower New York furnished one good transaction in the purchase by the New York Title and Mortgage Company from the Fidelity and Casualty Company of the twelve and twenty-one story buildings covering about three-fourths of the block bounded by Temple, Cedar and Liberty Streets and Trinity Place. The two structures have a frontage of 115.4 feet on Temple Street, 100.8 on Cedar Street, 52.6 on Liberty Street and 38.3 on Trinity Place. The transaction represented about $1,500,000. The Fidelity Company now occupies the space in both buildings, but is moving to the new structure at 80 Maiden Lane next year. The greater part of the space will then be used by the New York Title and Mortgage Company.

Interest in Eleventh Avenue's business development was heightened in the sale by Max N. Natanson of the six-story building under construction at 630-36 West Fifty-fifth Street, running through to Fifty-fourth Street, a plot 100 by 200, to the Denison Realty Corporation. It is known as the Canada Dry Building and is under lease for twenty-one years to G. B. Seely's Sons.

The eastern section of Forty-second Street also furnished an interesting transaction in the purchase of an eighty-four-year leasehold at the southwest corner of Second Avenue and Forty-second Street by the Manliss Realty Corporation. By the deal the Manliss concern has assembled a plot at that point fronting 230 feet on Forty-second Street and 98 on Second Avenue. No immediate improvement plans are announced.

The chief feature in the suburban area was the purchase by George K. Morrow of the United Cigar Stores Company from Arthur Hammerstein of the latter's elaborate country home at Beechhurst, on the north shore of Long Island. The property contains about five acres, with a large English Tudor house erected in 1924, boat landing, bathing beach and tennis courts. The property was valued at about $400,000.

MONEY FOR BUILDING.

Ample Funds Available for Sensible Types of Construction.

Ample financing is available for "sensible" building construction, according to Irving Lee Bloch, vice president of the Long Island Title Guarantee Company. He points out that by "sensible," he means the type of development constructed to meet a legitimate demand, instead of one that depends upon a speculative future.

"There has always been plenty of money available for the right type of building, even during the past months of depression," says Mr. Bloch. "Because financing agencies have shown the common sense not to invest funds in buildings for which there was no obvious need, there have been some erroneous opinions that building money was scarce.

"There are three types of builders who will continue to find money tight, in my belief. They are: The purely speculative type who gambles on the future market for his unit; the inexperienced type, who uses optimism for his lack of judgment as to the location and type of unit to be built, and the type who does not have adequate financial means of his own to provide a safe margin for outside investments."

2 BIG BUILDINGS PLANNED.

$3,200,000 to Be Spent in Erecting Warehouse and Flat.

Plans were Filed yesterday for two buildings in Manhattan to be erected at an aggregate cost of $3,300,000.

The Central-Park-Eighty-eighth Street Corporation of 1,440 Broadway filed for an eighteen-story and penthouse apartment at 2-12 West Eighty-eighth Street, southwest corner of Central Park West. The site is 125 by 160 feet, and the Plans were prepared by Emery Roth, architect, who estimated the cost at $1,800,000.

At 101-115 West End Avenue, comprising the whole westerly blockfront from Sixty-fourth to Sixty-fifth Street, the New York Central Railroad Company is to erect an eight-story warehouse and garage. The site is 200 by 267 feet. De Pace & Justice, Inc., filed the plans and estimated the cost of the project at $1,500,000.

BUILDING RECORD FOR MIDTOWN SKYSCRAPER

Thirty-five-Story Structure at 1,400 Broadway Far Ahead of Schedule.

The American flag was hoisted last week on the pinnacle of the thirty-five-story building being erected on the northeast corner of Thirty-eighth Street and Broadway by Abraham Gevirtz to mark the completion of the steel work, which has been erected in record time.

The structure, which is said to be one of the largest in the world devoted exclusively to the coat and dress trade, occupies the site of the old Knickerbocker Theatre, for years a landmark of the section.

The demolition of this famous playhouse was begun on the first of last February, and today thirty-five stories of steel tower above the street.

Every possible human effort, aided by modern machinery and building methods, has been used to rush the work, with the result that it is far ahead of schedule and, according to Mr. Gevirtz, will be completely enclosed and all masonry completed by Sept. 1.

Designed especially for the garment trades, the structure has many unusual features, time and labor saving devices.

The thirty-five floors, some of which contain 29,000 square feet, are served by nineteen automatic signal-control leveling elevators, thirteen of which are for passenger service and six for fast freight.

Three entrances, one on Broadway and one on Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth Streets, will give entrance to a spacious, ornate lobby.

That there is a demand for this class of structure in the midtown Broadway section is shown by the fact that 75 per cent of the building has already been leased to a large number of popular-priced dress houses, in addition to leading coat houses. Several of the lower floors have been leased to well-known silk and lace concerns.

Mr. Gevirtz, pleased with the progress of the work, has announced that upon completion awards would be made to the men of the various trades engaged in the erection of the building.

The firm of Ely Jacques Kahn are the architects for the building, Godfrey M. Weinstein Company, Inc., the builders and Thoens & Flaunlacher the renting agents.

The structure will be ready for occupancy on Jan. 1, 1931.

MANY HOME BUYERS.

Realty Associates Sell Eighteen Houses in One Week.

Eighteen homes in various sections of Brooklyn and Long Island were sold during the week ended Aug. 15, by Realty Associates, Inc. This is an increase over the previous weekly record for 1930 of fourteen homes sold during the week of July 5.

Harry D. Burchell, vice president and general manager of Realty Associates, states that the sales were due largely to the low prices and easy terms offered. Some of the dwellings were taken in foreclosure and were sold at less than the actual cost of construction. One example is a group of brick homes on Flatlands Avenue and East 103d Street. These houses cost at least $6,000 for construction, without the cost of the land and builder's profit. They were built to sell for $8,750 and Mr. Burchell says they are being offered at $6,250, with small down payments and ten-year second mortgages.

West Side Dwelling Rented.

The three-story Colonial dwelling on a lot 25 by 100 feet at 323 West Eighty-fifth Street has been leased by Donald P. Hart to George T. Oldham, who will occupy the house after alterations. John F. Gowlan acted as broker.

WINTHROP HEIRS SEEK REALTY SALE

Court Asked to Permit Disposal of Eighty Parcels on Manhattan Island.

The prospective sale of eighty parcels of real estate remaining out of the holdings of Benjamin R. Winthrop, who died in 1879, has been made known as the result of a suit filed in the Supreme Court by Annie Neilson Curtis of 179 Marlborough Street, Boston, daughter of Mr. Winthrop, to join in the sale by disposing of her life interest in a fifth of the property situated on the lower east side. The case came before Justice Schmuck on an application to serve the papers on the next of kin of Mrs. Curtis who will inherit her share upon her death. After a hearing has been held the court will determine whether or not to grant permission to make the sale.

The property consists of the following parcels:

5, 6-8, 7, 10, 12 and 14 Avenue A.

55, 57, 59, 61, 111, 113, 115, 117 Avenue B.

249-251, 253, 255 and 257 First Avenue.

138 Second Avenue.

37, 230, 232, 234, 236, 238 and 240 Third Avenue.

174 Suffolk Street, and 147, 168 and 176 Essex Street.

217, 244, 246, 248 and 250 Houston Street.

148, 149, 150, 161 and 183 Ludlow Street.

100 Stanton Street.

98½, 100, 102, 118, East First Street.

160, 162, 164, 165, 166-168, 167, 169, 170-172, 174, 176, 178-180 and 182-184 East Second Street.

170, 172, 174, 183, 185, 187 East Third Street.

255, 257, 259, 261, 263, 265, 274, 276, 278, 280, 282, 284, 286, 288, 290 East Fourth Street, and northwesterly 8 feet and 6 inches of 292 East Fourth Street.

Held More Than Fifty Years.

The complaint in the Curtis suit states that this completes all the Benjamin R. Winthrop property not previously sold or acquired by the city in condemnation proceedings. The eighty lots had been in the Winthrop family for more than fifty years and the buildings on them are at least thirty years old and some older. They are stated to be in constant need of repair, with rentals not commensurate with the value of the property. Since 1924 vacancies in the buildings have been increasing and the rentals decreasing, with the result that while in 1924 the net return was $138,847, it was only $109,691 in 1928.

Mrs. Curtis alleges that it is impracticable to make long-term leases on the holdings on account of the existing low rentals and because the number of the properties would make the cost of proceedings in court for permission to make the lease excessive, since each case must be considered alone. She believes it will be for the best interest of all concerned to sell the property on the most favorable terms than can be obtained.

The complaint recites that there is no other property in the Benjamin R. Winthrop estate in which the plaintiff has an interest except the award by the city for 209, 213, 215 and 220 Houston Street, and 163 Essex Street, taken in condemnation proceedings on Sept. 23 last. The property is all unmortgaged, it is stated. The assessed value of Mrs. Curtis's fifth interest in 1929 was $285,329 for the land and $439,314 for the land and buildings, while in 1930 the assessments were $303,029 and $452,714, respectively. Her net income in 1929 was only $15,012, which amounted to only 3.42 per cent of the assessed value of the property.

The will of Benjamin R. Winthrop left his residuary estate, including his real estate, in five equal shares to his three sons and two daughters. Mrs. Eliza S. Kernochan, daughter, died in 1914, while his son Edgerton died in 1910 and Benjamin R. Winthrop Jr., died last year. Neilson Winthrop, the third son, is still alive.

Manhattan's Decline in Population Indicative of Its Business Growth

Skyscrapers Replace Dwellings, and While Population Has Decreased 20% Since 1910, Assessed Values of Real Estate Have Increased More Than 100%.

"To the stranger ignorant of the growth and development of the Borough of Manhattan the figures of the 1930 United States Government census would lead him to think that the island was at a standstill or in a decline," said Joseph P. Day, discussing the population trend and changing centres.

"Would you not draw the same conclusion about a foreign city if you were told that it had not gained in population in thirty years?" said Mr. Day.

"Nothing could be further from the truth. Nothing could better demonstrate the fact that it is dangerous to draw conclusions from bare figures and statistics with no knowledge of the facts behind them.

"The government census of 1930 throws into sharp relief several important facts with reference to the population trend in the Borough of Manhattan as compared with that in New York City as a whole.

Figures on Recent Decline.

"These are of general interest to every resident of New York City, but possess special significance for the real estate investor, operator and broker. The resident population of Manhattan reached its maximum in 1910. Following is the United States census report of Manhattan's population for the past thirty years:

	Population of Manhattan.	Comparison With 1910.
1900	1,850,093	79.3%
1910	2,331,542	100.0%
1920	2,284,103	98.0%
1930	1,859,925	79.8%

"The fact that stands out in this table is that the population of Manhattan today is within 10,000 of what it was in 1900. On the other hand, the following table of United States census figures for New York City as a whole shows that the population has more than doubled during the same thirty-year period:

	Population of N. Y. City.	Comparison With 1910.
1900	3,437,202	72.1%
1910	4,766,883	100.0%
1920	5,620,048	117.9%
1930	6,959,195	146.0%

"The period from 1910 to 1930 comprises two of the most important decades in American history. The first embraces the period of the World War. The second was the reconstruction period following the war.

"The war period definitely laid the foundations for transferring world leadership in business and finance from London, Paris and Berlin to New York City.

"The reconstruction period from 1920 to 1930 made this transfer of power and importance an accomplished fact.

"From 1900 to 1910 both Manhattan and Greater New York were steadily increasing in population. During this first decade of the twentieth century there was sufficient vacant or undeveloped land in Manhattan to permit both business and residential growth on a large scale without one encroaching upon the other.

"Offices, stores and manufacturing buildings were going up on the lower half of the island without competing for land with the thousands of apartments and homes which were being built on the upper half.

"The tide turned in 1910. Vacant land in Manhattan had almost disappeared. Before a new building could go up an old one had to be torn down. Business began to get the upper hand. And it is an axiom in real estate that where the business building and the residential building compete as to location business can always afford to pay the higher price for land.

"What has been the result in Manhattan? Since 1910 its population has decreased 20 per cent, while the assessed valuation of its real estate has increased more than 100 per cent in the same period.

Rate of Decrease Rises.

"The population decrease was only at the average rate of 4,700 per year from 1910 to 1920, during which time the population of New York City as a whole was gaining at the rate of 85,000 per year. This trend was greatly accelerated from 1920 to 1930.

"During this decade Manhattan was losing in population at the average rate of 42,000 per year, while the entire city was gaining at the rate of 133,000 per year.

"Both as a Manhattan property owner and as a real estate man, I can see nothing but good in this trend. So long as it continues I know that Manhattan real estate values are increasing for business purposes, and that vacant land in the other boroughs is being built up for residential purposes.

"The Manhattan of the future will be more and more a business city. It will be increasingly the 'downtown section' of the surrounding areas.

"It is conceivable that the time may even come when Manhattan will have practically no resident population at all. Would this mean that the island had decreased in importance or in real estate value? Quite the contrary.

"It would mean that every square foot of land was needed for business purposes, and that the surrounding territory for fifty miles around was needed for the homes of the workers employed by this business capital of the world.

Steady Trade Growth Seen.

"Needless to say, the industrial development of Brooklyn, Long Island City and the Bronx accounts for a considerable portion of the increased population in these areas, entirely independent of Manhattan.

"Such population, however, is probably more than offset by increases in Westchester County, Long Island and Northern New Jersey of families which obtain their living directly or indirectly from Manhattan.

"From a real estate viewpoint, no territory in the world has a richer future than New York and its environs. Manhattan faces a future of steadily rising land values due to its ever-growing importance as the world's business and financial centre.

"The other boroughs and the suburbs face a future of steadily rising land values due to their increasing importance for housing and serving Manhattan's army of workers, and for the location of industries which benefit from or depend for their success upon their proximity to Manhattan."

MODEL APARTMENT TO OPEN ON OCT. 15

Work Nearing Completion on State Housing Board's Grand St. Project.

The model apartment building being erected under the supervision of the State Board of Housing on the old Hoe printing press factory block, bounded by Grand, Sheriff, Broome and Columbia Streets, probably will be opened on Oct. 15, according to officials of the board. It will be conducted on the partial cooperative and rental plan.

Work on the building has reached the stage where sales offices have been opened on the premises. Nearly one-third of the 235 suites have been sold from the plans and sponsors of the project expect that most of the building will have tenants by the opening date. An increase in the number of inquiries has been noted since construction has reached the point where prospective tenants may inspect the apartment layout and gain a good idea of the accommodations provided. Management of the building is in the hands of Amalgamated Dwellings, Inc.

An inspection of the structure last week showed that many of the facilities and much of the building material and equipment are similar to those used in the exclusive residential structures of Manhattan. Many of the apartments extend through from the street to the court, providing ample light and air. Approximately 24,000 square feet of space above the stores on the Grand Street side has been left open to provide additional light and air.

Copper flashings, metal door frames and tile for bathrooms are examples of the sort of materials being utilized. Push-button elevators are being installed and other conveniences include incinerators and large closet space. The kitchens are unusually large. The two sections of roof garden comprise 10,000 square feet of space. Elevators will run direct to the roof.

Auditorium for Tenants.

There will be fourteen stores in the building, all on the ground floor on the Grand Street frontage. Directly beneath these, with an entrance from the court, will be an auditorium with a capacity of 300 persons, which may be used by tenants for entertainments and meetings. Ornamental lights will be provided at the court entrances. The building is six stories high on the Grand Street side. A 19-foot drop in the street level between Grand and Broome Streets allows a seven-story height on the latter side.

The suites are being sold at an average of $500 a room, payable over a long period. They are of three, four and five rooms. Monthly rental payments average $12.50 a room. A typical three-room suite on the second floor of the Grand Street side, on which the monthly rental is $33, contains a large living room with bay window, bedroom with two windows, kitchen with approximately 140 square feet of floor space, two large closets and a hallway.

One of the most satisfying experiences which the State Board of Housing has had in connection with the project has been the enthusiastic cooperation of all persons associated with the enterprise, according to Aaron Rabinowitz, a member of the board. Architects, contractors, dealers furnishing materials and the workmen themselves have taken a keen interest in the progress of the work. As an example the case of a bricklayer was cited who suggested and volunteered to build without charge an ornamental drinking fountain which will serve persons on the roof garden.

The model building already is having a wholesome effect on the tenement neighborhood in which it is located. The example in modern apartment facilities set by the building and the competition it gives to the old flats surrounding it have inspired the owners of those tenements to undertake painting and remodeling.

RESEARCH NEARS END ON BUILDING CODE

Technical Committees Have Held 238 Meetings During the Past Year.

Research work on the new building code, being prepared by the Merchants' Association at the request of Mayor Walker, is nearing an end, according to a report of progress on the code covering the past fiscal year.

The report shows that 238 formal meetings were held by technical committees during the year, with an average attendance of more than 80 per cent of the members, and averaging more than two hours each in length. Many informal conferences also were held.

"As the technical committees reported, their recommendations were reviewed by the cabinet committee and representatives of the city departments and bureaus of buildings," the report explains. "After their comments and suggestions had been reviewed by the technical committees, the reports were prepared for submission to the advisory committee. In December, 1929, seven of these reports covering foundations, structural steel and iron, minimum loads, reinforced concrete, wood, protection of the public and workmen during construction, and protection of adjoining property were distributed to the advisory committee and suggestions invited.

"As the year ends, research work is practically completed, and the work of editing and co-ordinating is under way. When a consensus as to the draft revision has been obtained the committee on building laws and regulations will present its report to the board of directors, and, upon their approval, it will be submitted to the Mayor for official action."

ALLWOOD MODEL HOME.

Official Opening This Afternoon at New Development.

The official opening of the Allwood model home will be held this afternoon at Allwood, Passaic County, N. J. State Senator Roy T. Yates of Passaic County will turn the key which will officially open the home.

Addresses will be made by Senator Yates, Mayor William P. Jordan of Clifton, and Charles H. Reis and Newland C. Prior, president and vice president, respectively, of Charles H. Reis, Inc., builders and developers of Allwood.

The house is at the corner of Marlboro Road and Stone House Plains Road, where the first unit of fifty homes is being erected by Charles H. Reis, Inc., builders of Sunshine City in Bergen County.

Finishing Westchester Road.

The new by-pass road which will lead around the village of Lawrence Farms between Mount Kisco and Chappaqua in Westchester County is nearing completion. When finished it will be turned over to the town of Newcastle. It is an 80-foot highway leading from Bedford Road to the tracks of the Harlem division of the New York Central Railroad, which it will ultimately span by means of an overhead crossing. When opened to traffic, Roaring Brook Road, the present through thoroughfare, will be abandoned.

Buys Large Bronxville House.

Schmiedel & McCarthy of Bronxville have sold the English Tudor type house in Lawrence Park West, Westchester County, to Timothy A. Kenny. The house contains seventeen rooms and stands at the corner of Hampshire Road and Hampshire Circle on a plot of 27,000 square feet. The brokers also sold to Mr. Kenny an additional plot of 40,000 square feet extending from the house plot to Glen Washington Road.

COOPERATIVE HOTEL MAKES CITY DEBUT

Inaugurate Ownership Plan for Sixteen-Story Riverside Drive Edifice.

ON 80TH STREET CORNER

Building Contains 127 Rooms With Two Penthouse Apartments on the Roof.

No longer will the dwellers in many high-class apartment houses enjoy the distinctive monopoly of owning on the cooperative plan the space occupied by their living quarters. The cooperative apartment system which was a marked innovation only a few years ago has now grown to such proportions that a cooperative house no longer excites any special comment. The fact that several new ones are under construction on the east side for opening this Fall clearly attests to their well-sustained popularity.

The movement from the cooperative apartment building to a cooperative hotel is a perfectly logical one, but hitherto no one in this city and, so far as is known, no one in the country, saw fit to take that step, perhaps because the necessity did not seem sufficiently urgent. In all first movements some one has to recognize if not anticipate the necessity and then make the pioneer step. These pioneers are frequently laughed at, often called reckless, but with the first glimmering of success a multitude of followers soon will be seen traveling the same road.

Maurice Deutsch Heads Company.

What may be called the pioneer cooperative hotel in New York City, and it is said to be the first in the United States, has just been started. The organizers have spent several months in working out a carefully detailed plan which will afford the maximum protection financially, and also in respect to living comforts to the owning tenants, and it was announced last week that several leases on the cooperative hotel basis have been made.

This pioneer cooperative hotel is the sixteen-story building with penthouse on the north corner of Riverside Drive and Eightieth Street. It will be known as Riverside Towers. It occupies a plot fronting 41.6 feet on Riverside Drive and 41.9 feet on Eightieth Street, about half a mile below the Soldiers and Sailors Monument and a few blocks west of the Museum of Natural History. The structure was erected as an apartment hotel about two years ago. Recently it was taken over by the Hotel Housing Corporation, of which Maurice Deutsch is president and A. J. Hammerslough vice president. A subsidiary company known as the 327 West Eightieth Street Holding Corporation will manage the hotel on the cooperative basis.

Maurice Deutsch, who heads the company has had considerable experience as an architect and builder of apartment and other buildings in this city.

The Riverside Towers building was built as a hotel with single rooms predominating, some having individual baths but the majority having a connecting bath between two rooms. There is a penthouse on the roof containing two apartments of two rooms each with bath. With the exception of the penthouse suites and some of the larger rooms with individual bath the cooperative ownership plan involves payments of from $450 to $800 per room.

Weekly Maintenance Charge.

There is a weekly maintenance charge graduated on the purchase price of the room. Taking a $600 room as a typical example, the weekly maintenance charge averages $8.80 a week plus an additional $2, which goes into a capital or thrift account, this sum being used to pay off existing mortgages while being added at the same time to the equity in the property held by the tenant owner. This makes a total of $10.80 a week for the $600 room owner but at the end of sixteen years when the mortgages will be cleared off, he will be credited with the amount paid in on the $2 capital weekly charge, in extra stock.

According to the maintenance and amortization charges of the cooperative plan, the $600 tenant roomer will receive on payment six shares of the value of $100 each, but at the expiration of sixteen years his additional payments will entitle him to twenty-four extra shares, giving him an equity value in the property equivalent to $3,000. For some of the larger single rooms with individual bath the ownership cost is [illegible], while the two penthouses will sell for $2,500 and $3,000, respectively. The payments include the rooms furnished and necessary linen is provided by the management.

The hotel contains 127 rooms, but for the present it has been decided to retain about twenty rooms for general leasing, applying the amount so obtained to the general maintenance fund.

"The plan now being offered in connection with Riverside Towers," said Mr. Deutsch yesterday, "is an illustration of the rapid change in American ways of living since the World War. With the revolutionary change in price levels the entrance of women into business, methods of living have very materially altered. Men and women in business, married or unmarried, today seek permanent homes at a price comfortably within their means where the problems of housekeeping, service, furniture, linens and similar details are minimized or eliminated. This has given rise to the idea of a cooperative residence hotel where living comforts and freedom from household responsibility can be obtained at a reasonable cost."

The holding corporation has taken over the property at a valuation of $340,000. The first mortgage on the property is $182,000, having been $300,000 when the structure was finished, and a second mortgage of $92,500 has been placed.

ACTIVITY NOTED IN SUBURBAN RESIDENTIAL PROPERTIES

EVENTS OF THE WEEK IN THE REALTY FIELD

Light Metropolitan Trading Is Relieved by Activity in Apartment House Renting.

$1,500,000 DEAL DOWNTOWN

Survey of Six Months' Prices Shows Marked Decline in Manhattan Property Transfers.

Quiet conditions prevailed in the realty field throughout the metropolitan area last week. Both urban and suburban trading evinced little activity. The only apparent bright element, and that only in certain localities, was apartment house leasing for Fall occupancy, a renewal of renting interest being reported in the lower Fifth Avenue district, in the Central Park West locality and in some parts of the east side.

The weekly summary of The Record and Guide yesterday showed that, based on assessed valuations, realty conveyances in Manhattan fell approximately 31 per cent in July below the corresponding month last year.

"During July," says The Record and Guide's report, "there were 647 conveyances of Manhattan real property recorded, the assessed valuation being $100,703,175, as compared with 1,011 conveyances recorded in July, 1929, the assessed valuation being $146,619,800. This decline is greater than had been anticipated, as the difference for the first six months of this year as compared with the January-June period, 1929, was only approximately 20 per cent. That brokers' commissions fell precipitately during the last month is apparent."

Good Downtown Deal.

Lower New York furnished one good transaction in the purchase by the New York Title and Mortgage Company from the Fidelity and Casualty Company of the twelve and twenty-one story buildings covering about three-fourths of the block bounded by Temple, Cedar and Liberty Streets and Trinity Place. The two structures have a frontage of 115.4 feet on Temple Street, 100.8 on Cedar Street, 52.6 on Liberty Street and 33.3 on Trinity Place. The transaction represented about $1,500,000. The Fidelity Company now occupies the space in both buildings, but is moving to the new structure at 80 Maiden Lane next year. The greater part of the space will then be used by the New York Title and Mortgage Company.

Interest in Eleventh Avenue's business development was heightened in the sale by Max N. Natanson of the six-story building under construction at 630-36 West Fifty-fifth Street, running through to Fifty-fourth Street, a plot 100 by 200, to the Denison Realty Corporation. It is known as the Canada Dry Building and is under lease for twenty-one years to G. B. Seely's Sons.

The eastern section of Forty-second Street also furnished an interesting transaction in the purchase of an eighty-four-year leasehold at the southwest corner of Second Avenue and Forty-second Street by the Manliss Realty Corporation. By the deal the Manliss concern has assembled a plot at that point fronting 230 feet on Forty-second Street and 98 on Second Avenue. No immediate improvement plans are announced.

The chief feature in the suburban area was the purchase by George K. Morrow of the United Cigar Stores Company from Arthur Hammerstein of the latter's elaborate country home at Beechhurst, on the north shore of Long Island. The property contains about five acres, with a large English Tudor house erected in 1924, boat landing, bathing beach and tennis courts. The property was valued at about $400,000.

MONEY FOR BUILDING.

Ample Funds Available for Sensible Types of Construction.

Ample financing is available for "sensible" building construction, according to Irving Lee Bloch, vice president of the Long Island Title Guarantee Company. He points out that by "sensible," he means the type of development constructed to meet a legitimate demand, instead of one that depends upon a speculative future.

"There has always been plenty of money available for the right type of building, even during the past months of depression," says Mr. Bloch. "Because financing agencies have shown the common sense not to invest funds in buildings for which there was no obvious need, there have been some erroneous opinions that building money was scarce.

"There are three types of builders who will continue to find money tight, in my belief. They are: The purely speculative type who gambles on the future market for his unit; the inexperienced type, who uses optimism for his lack of judgment as to the location and type of unit to be built, and the type who does not have adequate financial means of his own to provide a safe margin for outside investments."

2 BIG BUILDINGS PLANNED.

$3,200,000 to Be Spent in Erecting Warehouse and Flat.

Plans were Filed yesterday for two buildings in Manhattan to be erected at an aggregate cost of $3,300,000.

The Central-Park-Eighty-eighth Street Corporation of 1,440 Broadway filed for an eighteen-story and penthouse apartment at 2-12 West Eighty-eighth Street, southwest corner of Central Park West. The site is 125 by 160 feet, and the Plans were prepared by Emery Roth, architect, who estimated the cost at $1,800,000.

At 101-115 West End Avenue, comprising the whole westerly blockfront from Sixty-fourth to Sixty-fifth Street, the New York Central Railroad Company is to erect an eight-story warehouse and garage. The site is 200 by 267 feet. De Pace & Justice, Inc., filed the plans and estiamted the cost of the project at $1,500,000.

BUILDING RECORD FOR MIDTOWN SKYSCRAPER

Thirty-five-Story Structure at 1,400 Broadway Far Ahead of Schedule.

The American flag was hoisted last week on the pinnacle of the thirty-five-story building being erected on the northeast corner of Thirty-eighth Street and Broadway by Abraham Gevirtz to mark the completion of the steel work, which has been erected in record time.

The structure, which is said to be one of the largest in the world devoted exclusively to the coat and dress trade, occupies the site of the old Knickerbocker Theatre, for years a landmark of the section.

The demolition of this famous playhouse was begun on the first of last February, and today thirty-five stories of steel tower above the street.

Every possible human effort, aided by modern machinery and building methods, has been used to rush the work, with the result that it is far ahead of schedule and, according to Mr. Gevirtz, will be completely enclosed and all masonry completed by Sept. 1.

Designed especially for the garment trades, the structure has many unusual features, time and labor saving devices.

The thirty-five floors, some of which contain 29,000 square feet, are served by nineteen automatic signal-control leveling elevators, thirteen of which are for passenger service and six for fast freight.

Three entrances, one on Broadway and one on Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth Streets, will give entrance to a spacious, ornate lobby.

That there is a demand for this class of structure in the midtown Broadway section is shown by the fact that 75 per cent of the building has already been leased to a large number of popular-priced dress houses, in addition to leading coat houses. Several of the lower floors have been leased to well-known silk and lace concerns.

Mr. Gevirtz, pleased with the progress of the work, has announced that upon completion awards would be made to the men of the various trades engaged in the erection of the building.

The firm of Ely Jacques Kahn are the architects for the building, Godfrey M. Weinstein Company, Inc., the builders and Thoens & Flaunlacher the renting agents.

The structure will be ready for occupancy on Jan. 1, 1931.

MANY HOME BUYERS.

Realty Associates Sell Eighteen Houses in One Week.

Eighteen homes in various sections of Brooklyn and Long Island were sold during the week ended Aug. 15, by Realty Associates, Inc. This is an increase over the previous weekly record for 1930 of fourteen homes sold during the week of July 5.

Harry D. Burchell, vice president and general manager of Realty Associates, states that the sales were due largely to the low prices and easy terms offered. Some of the dwellings were taken in foreclosure and were sold at less than the actual cost of construction. One example is a group of brick homes on Flatlands Avenue and East 103d Street. These houses cost at least $6,000 for construction, without the cost of the land and builder's profit. They were built to sell for $8,750 and Mr. Burchell says they are being offered at $6,250, with small down payments and ten-year second mortgages.

West Side Dwelling Rented.

The three-story Colonial dwelling on a lot 25 by 100 feet at 323 West Eighty-fifth Street has been leased by Donald P. Hart to George T. Oldham, who will occupy the house after alterations. John F. Gowlan acted as broker.

WINTHROP HEIRS SEEK REALTY SALE

Court Asked to Permit Disposal of Eighty Parcels on Manhattan Island.

The prospective sale of eighty parcels of real estate remaining out of the holdings of Benjamin R. Winthrop, who died in 1879, has been made known as the result of a suit filed in the Supreme Court by Annie Neilson Curtis of 179 Marlborough Street, Boston, daughter of Mr. Winthrop, to join in the sale by disposing of her life interest in a fifth of the property situated on the lower east side. The case came before Justice Schmuck on an application to serve the papers on the next of kin of Mrs. Curtis who will inherit her share upon her death. After a hearing has been held the court will determine whether or not to grant permission to make the sale.

The property consists of the following parcels:

5, 6-8, 7, 10, 12 and 14 Avenue A.

55, 57, 59, 61, 111, 113, 115, 117 Avenue B.

249-251, 253, 255 and 257 First Avenue.

138 Second Avenue.

37, 230, 232, 234, 236, 238 and 240 Third Avenue.

174 Suffolk Street, and 147, 168 and 176 Essex Street.

217, 244, 246, 248 and 250 Houston Street.

148, 149, 150, 161 and 183 Ludlow Street.

100 Stanton Street.

98½, 100, 102, 118, East First Street.

160, 162, 164, 165, 166-168, 167, 169, 170-172, 174, 176, 178-180 and 182-184 East Second Street.

170, 172, 174, 183, 185, 187 East Third Street.

255, 257, 259, 261, 263, 265, 274, 276, 278, 280, 282, 284, 286, 288, 290 East Fourth Street, and northwesterly 8 feet and 6 inches of 292 East Fourth Street.

Held More Than Fifty Years.

The complaint in the Curtis suit states that this completes all the Benjamin R. Winthrop property not previously sold or acquired by the city in condemnation proceedings. The eighty lots had been in the Winthrop family for more than fifty years and the buildings on them are at least thirty years old and some older. They are stated to be in constant need of repair, with rentals not commensurate with the value of the property. Since 1924 vacancies in the buildings have been increasing and the rentals decreasing, with the result that while in 1924 the net return was $138,847, it was only $109,691 in 1928.

Mrs. Curtis alleges that it is impracticable to make long-term leases on the holdings on account of the existing low rentals and because the number of the properties would make the cost of proceedings in court for permission to make the lease excessive, since each case must be considered alone. She believes it will be for the best interest of all concerned to sell the property on the most favorable terms than can be obtained.

The complaint recites that there is no other property in the Benjamin R. Winthrop estate in which the plaintiff has an interest except the award by the city for 209, 213, 215 and 220 Houston Street, and 163 Essex Street, taken in condemnation proceedings on Sept. 23 last. The property is all unmortgaged, it is stated. The assessed value of Mrs. Curtis's fifth interest in 1929 was $285,329 for the land and $439,314 for the land and buildings, while in 1930 the assessments were $303,029 and $452,714, respectively. Her net income in 1929 was only $15,012, which amounted to only 3.42 per cent of the assessed value of the property.

The will of Benjamin R. Winthrop left his residuary estate, including his real estate, in five equal shares to his three sons and two daughters. Mrs. Eliza S. Kernochan, daughter, died in 1914, while his son Edgerton died in 1910 and Benjamin R. Winthrop Jr., died last year. Neilson Winthrop, the third son, is still alive.

Manhattan's Decline in Population Indicative of Its Business Growth

Skyscrapers Replace Dwellings, and While Population Has Decreased 20% Since 1910, Assessed Values of Real Estate Have Increased More Than 100%.

"To the stranger ignorant of the growth and development of the Borough of Manhattan the figures of the 1930 United States Government census would lead him to think that the island was at a standstill or in a decline," said Joseph P. Day, discussing the population trend and changing centres.

"Would you not draw the same conclusion about a foreign city if you were told that it had not gained in population in thirty years?" said Mr. Day.

"Nothing could be further from the truth. Nothing could better demonstrate the fact that it is dangerous to draw conclusions from bare figures and statistics with no knowledge of the facts behind them.

"The government census of 1930 throws into sharp relief several important facts with reference to the population trend in the Borough of Manhattan as compared with that in New York City as a whole.

Figures on Recent Decline.

"These are of general interest to every resident of New York City, but possess special significance for the real estate investor, operator and broker. The resident population of Manhattan reached its maximum in 1910. Following is the United States census report of Manhattan's population for the past thirty years:

	Population of Manhattan.	Comparison With 1910.
1900	1,850,093	79.3%
1910	2,331,542	100.0%
1920	2,284,103	98.0%
1930	1,859,925	79.8%

"The fact that stands out in this table is that the population of Manhattan today is within 10,000 of what it was in 1900. On the other hand, the following table of United States census figures for New York City as a whole shows that the population has more than doubled during the same thirty-year period:

	Population of N. Y. City.	Comparison With 1910.
1900	3,437,202	72.1%
1910	4,766,883	100.0%
1920	5,620,048	117.9%
1930	6,959,195	146.0%

"The period from 1910 to 1930 comprises two of the most important decades in American history. The first embraces the period of the World War. The second was the reconstruction period following the war.

"The war period definitely laid the foundations for transferring world leadership in business and finance from London, Paris and Berlin to New York City.

"The reconstruction period from 1920 to 1930 made this transfer of power and importance an accomplished fact.

"From 1900 to 1910 both Manhattan and Greater New York were steadily increasing in population. During this first decade of the twentieth century there was sufficient vacant or undeveloped land in Manhattan to permit both business and residential growth on a large scale without one encroaching upon the other.

"Offices, stores and manufacturing buildings were going up on the lower half of the island without competing for land with the thousands of apartments and homes which were being built on the upper half.

"The tide turned in 1910. Vacant land in Manhattan had almost disappeared. Before a new building could go up an old one had to be torn down. Business began to get the upper hand. And it is an axiom in real estate that where the business building and the residential building compete as to location business can always afford to pay the higher price for land.

"What has been the result in Manhattan? Since 1910 its population has decreased 20 per cent, while the assessed valuation of its real estate has increased more than 100 per cent in the same period.

Rate of Decrease Rises.

"The population decrease was only at the average rate of 4,700 per year from 1910 to 1920, during which time the population of New York City as a whole was gaining at the rate of 85,000 per year. This trend was greatly accelerated from 1920 to 1930.

"During this decade Manhattan was losing in population at the average rate of 42,000 per year, while the entire city was gaining at the rate of 133,000 per year.

"Both as a Manhattan property owner and as a real estate man, I can see nothing but good in this trend. So long as it continues I know that Manhattan real estate values are increasing for business purposes, and that vacant land in the other boroughs is being built up for residential purposes.

"The Manhattan of the future will be more and more a business city. It will be increasingly the 'downtown section' of the surrounding areas.

"It is conceivable that the time may even come when Manhattan will have practically no resident population at all. Would this mean that the island had decreased in importance or in real estate value? Quite the contrary.

"It would mean that every square foot of land was needed for business purposes, and that the surrounding territory for fifty miles around was needed for the homes of the workers employed by this business capital of the world.

Steady Trade Growth Seen.

"Needless to say, the industrial development of Brooklyn, Long Island City and the Bronx accounts for a considerable portion of the increased population in these areas, entirely independent of Manhattan.

"Such population, however, is probably more than offset by increases in Westchester County, Long Island and Northern New Jersey of families which obtain their living directly or indirectly from Manhattan.

"From a real estate viewpoint, no territory in the world has a richer future than New York and its environs. Manhattan faces a future of steadily rising land values due to its ever-growing importance as the world's business and financial centre.

"The other boroughs and the suburbs face a future of steadily rising land values due to their increasing importance for housing and serving Manhattan's army of workers, and for the location of industries which benefit from or depend for their success upon their proximity to Manhattan."

MODEL APARTMENT TO OPEN ON OCT. 15

Work Nearing Completion on State Housing Board's Grand St. Project.

The model apartment building being erected under the supervision of the State Board of Housing on the old Hoe printing press factory block, bounded by Grand, Sheriff, Broome and Columbia Streets, probably will be opened on Oct. 15, according to officials of the board. It will be conducted on the partial cooperative and rental plan.

Work on the building has reached the stage where sales offices have been opened on the premises. Nearly one-third of the 235 suites have been sold from the plans and sponsors of the project expect that most of the building will have tenants by the opening date. An increase in the number of inquiries has been noted since construction has reached the point where prospective tenants may inspect the apartment layout and gain a good idea of the accommodations provided. Management of the building is in the hands of Amalgamated Dwellings, Inc.

An inspection of the structure last week showed that many of the facilities and much of the building material and equipment are similar to those used in the exclusive residential structures of Manhattan. Many of the apartments extend through from the street to the court, providing ample light and air. Approximately 24,000 square feet of space above the stores on the Grand Street side has been left open to provide additional light and air.

Copper flashings, metal door frames and tile for bathrooms are examples of the sort of materials being utilized. Push-button elevators are being installed and other conveniences include incinerators and large closet space. The kitchens are unusually large. The two sections of roof garden comprise 10,000 square feet of space. Elevators will run direct to the roof.

Auditorium for Tenants.

There will be fourteen stores in the building, all on the ground floor on the Grand Street frontage. Directly beneath these, with an entrance from the court, will be an auditorium with a capacity of 300 persons, which may be used by tenants for entertainments and meetings. Ornamental lights will be provided at the court entrances. The building is six stories high on the Grand Street side. A 19-foot drop in the street level between Grand and Broome Streets allows a seven-story height on the latter side.

The suites are being sold at an average of $500 a room, payable over a long period. They are of three, four and five rooms. Monthly rental payments average $12.50 a room. A typical three-room suite on the second floor of the Grand Street side, on which the monthly rental is $33, contains a large living room with bay window, bedroom with two windows, kitchen with approximately 140 square feet of floor space, two large closets and a hallway.

One of the most satisfying experiences which the State Board of Housing has had in connection with the project has been the enthusiastic cooperation of all persons associated with the enterprise, according to Aaron Rabinowitz, a member of the board. Architects, contractors, dealers furnishing materials and the workmen themselves have taken a keen interest in the progress of the work. As an example the case of a bricklayer was cited who suggested and volunteered to build without charge an ornamental drinking fountain which will serve persons on the roof garden.

The model building already is having a wholesome effect on the tenement neighborhood in which it is located. The example in modern apartment facilities set by the building and the competition it gives to the old flats surrounding it have inspired the owners of those tenements to undertake painting and remodeling.

RESEARCH NEARS END ON BUILDING CODE

Technical Committees Have Held 238 Meetings During the Past Year.

Research work on the new building code, being prepared by the Merchants' Association at the request of Mayor Walker, is nearing an end, according to a report of progress on the code covering the past fiscal year.

The report shows that 238 formal meetings were held by technical committees during the year, with an average attendance of more than 80 per cent of the members, and averaging more than two hours each in length. Many informal conferences also were held.

"As the technical committees reported, their recommendations were reviewed by the cabinet committee and representatives of the city departments and bureaus of buildings," the report explains. "After their comments and suggestions had been reviewed by the technical committees, the reports were prepared for submission to the advisory committee. In December, 1929, seven of these reports covering foundations, structural steel and iron, minimum loads, reinforced concrete, wood, protection of the public and workmen during construction, and protection of adjoining property were distributed to the advisory committee and suggestions invited.

"As the year ends, research work is practically completed, and the work of editing and co-ordinating is under way. When a consensus as to the draft revision has been obtained the committee on building laws and regulations will present its report to the board of directors, and, upon their approval, it will be submitted to the Mayor for official action."

ALLWOOD MODEL HOME.

Official Opening This Afternoon at New Development.

The official opening of the Allwood model home will be held this afternoon at Allwood, Passaic County, N. J. State Senator Roy T. Yates of Passaic County will turn the key which will officially open the home.

Addresses will be made by Senator Yates, Mayor William P. Jordan of Clifton, and Charles H. Reis and Newland C. Prior, president and vice president, respectively, of Charles H. Reis, Inc., builders and developers of Allwood.

The house is at the corner of Marlboro Road and Stone House Plains Road, where the first unit of fifty homes is being erected by Charles H. Reis, Inc., builders of Sunshine City in Bergen County.

Finishing Westchester Road.

The new by-pass road which will lead around the village of Lawrence Farms between Mount Kisco and Chappaqua in Westchester County is nearing completion. When finished it will be turned over to the town of Newcastle. It is an 80-foot highway leading from Bedford Road to the tracks of the Harlem division of the New York Central Railroad, which it will ultimately span by means of an overhead crossing. When opened to traffic, Roaring Brook Road, the present through thoroughfare, will be abandoned.

Buys Large Bronxville House.

Schmiedel & McCarthy of Bronxville have sold the English Tudor type house in Lawrence Park West, Westchester County, to Timothy A. Kenny. The house contains seventeen rooms and stands at the corner of Hampshire Road and Hampshire Circle on a plot of 27,000 square feet. The brokers also sold to Mr. Kenny an additional plot of 40,000 square feet extending from the house plot to Glen Washington Road.

COOPERATIVE HOTEL MAKES CITY DEBUT

Inaugurate Ownership Plan for Sixteen-Story Riverside Drive Edifice.

ON 80TH STREET CORNER

Building Contains 127 Rooms With Two Penthouse Apartments on the Roof.

No longer will the dwellers in many high-class apartment houses enjoy the distinctive monopoly of owning on the cooperative plan the space occupied by their living quarters. The cooperative apartment system which was a marked innovation only a few years ago has now grown to such proportions that a cooperative house no longer excites any special comment. The fact that several new ones are under construction on the east side for opening this Fall clearly attests to their well-sustained popularity.

The movement from the cooperative apartment building to a cooperative hotel is a perfectly logical one, but hitherto no one in this city and, so far as is known, no one in the country, saw fit to take that step, perhaps because the necessity did not seem sufficiently urgent. In all first movements some one has to recognize if not anticipate the necessity and then make the pioneer step. These pioneers are frequently laughed at, often called reckless, but with the first glimmering of success a multitude of followers soon will be seen traveling the same road.

Maurice Deutsch Heads Company.

What may be called the pioneer cooperative hotel in New York City, and it is said to be the first in the United States, has just been started. The organizers have spent several months in working out a carefully detailed plan which will afford the maximum protection financially, and also in respect to living comforts to the owning tenants, and it was announced last week that several leases on the cooperative hotel basis have been made.

This pioneer cooperative hotel is the sixteen-story building with penthouse on the north corner of Riverside Drive and Eightieth Street. It will be known as Riverside Towers. It occupies a plot fronting 41.6 feet on Riverside Drive and 41.9 feet on Eightieth Street, about half a mile below the Soldiers and Sailors Monument and a few blocks west of the Museum of Natural History. The structure was erected as an apartment hotel about two years ago. Recently it was taken over by the Hotel Housing Corporation, of which Maurice Deutsch is president and A. J. Hammerslough vice president. A subsidiary company known as the 327 West Eightieth Street Holding Corporation will manage the hotel on the cooperative basis.

Maurice Deutsch, who heads the company has had considerable experience as an architect and builder of apartment and other buildings in this city.

The Riverside Towers building was built as a hotel with single rooms predominating, some having individual baths but the majority having a connecting bath between two rooms. There is a penthouse on the roof containing two apartments of two rooms each with bath. With the exception of the penthouse suites and some of the larger rooms with individual bath the cooperative ownership plan involves payments of from $450 to $800 per room.

Weekly Maintenance Charge.

There is a weekly maintenance charge graduated on the purchase price of the room. Taking a $600 room as a typical example, the weekly maintenance charge averages $8.80 a week plus an additional $2, which goes into a capital or thrift account, this sum being used to pay off existing mortgages while being added at the same time to the equity in the property held by the tenant owner. This makes a total of $10.80 a week for the $600 room owner but at the end of sixteen years when the mortgages will be cleared off, he will be credited with the amount paid in on the $2 capital weekly charge, in extra stock.

According to the maintenance and amortization charges of the cooperative plan, the $600 tenant roomer will receive on payment six shares of the value of $100 each, but at the expiration of sixteen years his additional payments will entitle him to twenty-four extra shares, giving him an equity value in the property equivalent to $3,000. For some of the larger single rooms with individual bath the ownership cost is $1,200, while the two penthouses will sell for $2,500 and $3,000, respectively. The payments include the rooms furnished and necessary linen is provided by the management.

The hotel contains 127 rooms, but for the present it has been decided to retain about twenty rooms for general leasing, applying the amount so obtained to the general maintenance fund.

"The plan now being offered in connection with Riverside Towers," said Mr. Deutsch yesterday, "is an illustration of the rapid change in American ways of living since the World War. With the revolutionary change in price levels the entrance of women into business, methods of living have very materially altered. Men and women in business, married or unmarried, today seek permanent homes at a price comfortably within their means where the problems of housekeeping, service, furniture, linens and similar details are minimized or eliminated. This has given rise to the idea of a cooperative residence hotel where living comforts and freedom from household responsibility can be obtained at a reasonable cost."

The holding corporation has taken over the property at a valuation of $340,000. The first mortgage on the property is $182,000, having been $300,000 when the structure was finished, and a second mortgage of $92,500 has been placed.

CIVIC IMPROVEMENTS AID GROWTH OF MADISON AVENUE

SUBWAY CONGESTION A BUSINESS MENACE

R. C. Brown Urges Quick Relief in Empire State and Grand Central Zones.

RESERVOIR STATION PLAN

He Advocates the Adoption of That System for Lexington Avenue Blocks.

Discussing traffic conditions in New York City and stating that the proposed Thirty-eighth Street vehicular tunnel will aid materially in eliminating in the areas from Broadway to the East River, between Thirtieth and Thirty-eighth Streets, as well as the Grand Central zone, the vast bulk of crosstown traffic bound to and from the upper North River ferries, Robert C. Brown, vice president of Empire State, Inc., points out that if subway congestion is not relieved as soon as possible, the utility of the Empire State section and the Grand Central zone for office buildings and trade centres will be destroyed.

"The crucial points of congestion," says Mr. Brown, "are at the Times Square station and the Grand Central terminal. Operation of the new Eighth Avenue subway next year will bring relief to Times Square, while work on reservoir platforms for the Grand Central subway station is in abeyance in face of the fact that the building of them is vital not only from the standpoint of business life in the neighborhoods mentioned but of human life.

"The city might as well neglect to increase its police force as occasion requires as to neglect to increase its platform facilities at over-congested subway stations.

"When it became necessary, as it did during the first quarter of the year, to close the subway station temporarily at Grand Central eleven times in order to conserve human life, evidence of the constant peril is overwhelming.

New Buildings Increase Crowd.

"Next year the situation will be more appalling, with many new buildings ready for occupancy. The Empire State will accommodate 50,000 occupants, or two-thirds of the total population of five other new buildings, while several large buildings closer to the Grand Central and ready for use next year will swell the host demanding ingress and egress from the subway at that point.

"Reservoir stations would increase express train service on the Lexington-Fourth Avenue line by 25 per cent, or facilities for 56,000,000 more passengers annually, which would reduce congestion at the Grand Central materially.

"The recently published report of the Transit Commission for the year ended Dec. 31, 1929, shows that the increase in the number of passengers using the Grand Central station almost doubled the combined increase of the Interborough and B. M. T. at the Times Square station.

"Furthermore, a survey made by the Thirty-fourth Street Association estimates that business buildings to be completed not later than 1931 in the territory between Twenty-eighth and Forty-eighth Streets, Madison Avenue and the East River, will provide for a population of 150,000. If only one-half of these people use the Lexington Avenue subway in going to and from their offices, and no account is taken of the increase to be expected from a heavier suburban traffic, they will absorb all of the added facilities which the reservoir station plan will supply.

"Every railroad man knows that, unless terminals are kept free and clear, the operation of the entire line is slowed down. The Grand Central has become clogged because of the congestion on train platforms and, as a result, it takes so long to load and unload trains that only thirty ten-car express trains can be operated each hour instead of forty trains, which is the tube's capacity. Ten additional ten-car trains would provide accommodations for nearly 20,000 more passengers an hour.

Reservoir Station Plan.

"The reservoir station plan, it will be recalled, involves the construction of only about 4,000 feet of new subway. It provides for the routing of all northbound trains over the new tracks, which would detour from the present Fourth Avenue line at Twenty-ninth Street to Lexington Avenue and rejoin the Lexington Avenue line at Forty-third Street. Southbound traffic would use the same tracks as now. A new express station would be built at Thirty-fourth Street and Lexington Avenue and an addition to the Grand Central station, under Lexington Avenue from Forty-first to Forty-third Street, which would provide the additional space needed at that point. It would, also, tend to segregate the north and south bound passengers and so reduce friction in traffic lanes.

"The present Thirty-fourth Street station at Park Avenue would become an express stop and all stations would have island platforms, so that two express trains, running in the same direction, could use the same platform at the same time and thus reduce the time consumed in loading and unloading of trains.

"While the proposed Second Avenue subway will greatly ease the traffic situation at Grand Central Terminal, it is, as yet, far in the future."

SELL WATERFRONT LOTS.

Large Tract on Island in Barnegat Bay at Auction.

An auction sale of 275 business and waterfront lots will be held by Joseph P. Day at Sunset Island in Barnegat Bay, N. J., on Saturday afternoon, Aug. 30, on the premises.

Sunset Island lies between Toms River and Seaside Heights, adjoining the latter town, where a railroad station, churches, schools and shopping facilities are available. The State Highway (Route 37) runs through the centre of Sunset Island, leading from the ocean to Toms River, Trenton, Philadelphia and other cities.

Bulkheads, sidewalks, curbs, gravel roads, electricity and water have been installed on the property, and the lots are ready for immediate building.

On one side of Sunset Island lies Barnegat Bay and on the other side is the Atlantic Ocean.

BROADWAY ARMORY OFFERED AT AUCTION

Block Now in Foreclosure Proceedings Which Sold for $3,375,000 Early Last Year.

The old 104th Field Artillery Armory, occupying the block bounded by Broadway, Columbus Avenue, Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Streets, will be offered at auction at noon tomorrow in the Vesey Street salesroom by the I. Lincoln Seide Company.

The sale is by order of the Supreme Court, in connection with the foreclosure of a first mortgage and interest amounting to $3,238,758. Back taxes and other charges against the property amount to $41,137. The sale will be held under the direction of Samuel S. Koenig, as referee. The site contains about 55,000 square feet and fronts 225.9 feet on Broadway, 200.1 feet on Columbus Avenue, 224.7 feet on Sixty-seventh Street and 327.9 feet on Sixty-eighth Street.

The armory was partially demolished several months ago, but work was halted when foreclosure proceedings were started by the Naol Holding Corporation against the Verschleiser Broadway Armory.

On Jan. 12, 1929 the property was sold for the city to Max Verschleiser for $3,375,000, and on May 15, 1929, the General Realty and Utilities Corporation made a loan of $3,500,000 at 6 per cent on the property, which it subsequently assigned to the Naol Holding Corporation.

FINISHING HOTEL EDISON.

Building in Modernistic Type With Eleven Setbacks.

Modified modern is the style of architecture adopted for the twenty-five-story Hotel Edison nearing completion at 228-248 West Forty-seventh Street, between Seventh and Eighth Avenues, according to the architect, Herbert J. Krapp.

"Due to the zoning restrictions," he explains, "we were obliged to design eleven setbacks and this necessitated careful treatment of the pilasters. The base of the façade is of Deer Island granite with Sones Sound granite above to the second floor where an ornamental terra cotta belt course in green, brown and white is utilized.

"The façade above the second story is of white enamel brick as are all other exterior walls. The spandrels, that is the space between the head of one window and the sill of the window above it, are of varicolored ornamental terra cotta and have been designed so as to produce the effect of contrasting the vertical lines of brick and of harmonizing with the window openings which are dark. These spandrels are modernistic in appearance with gray, green and brown predominating in the color scheme.

"The windows are of the French casement type, opening outward, and each contains eighteen panes.

The brick work was started June 2 and the penthouse was topped out June 30, one of the fastest brick jobs in recent years, according to L. L. Balleisen, who is the superintendent of construction for the Max J. Kramer Company, builder of the hotel. The owner is the Milnag Realty Corporation, Milton J. Kramer, a son of the builder, vice president.

NEW WATER WORKS.

Extensive Pumping System Opened at Carlstadt, N. J.

Water improvements have just been completed at a cost of approximately $50,000 at Carlstadt, N. J.

Nicholas S. Hill Jr., president of the Hackensack Water Company, explains that two tanks with a combined capacity of 1,250,000 gallons have been installed to apply added pressure to the 200,000 gallons of water which pass every twenty-four hours through the Carlstadt station. By means of this accelerating unit, residents of the high points in Carlstadt, Hasbrouck Heights and Woodridge are assured of water service which otherwise would present a difficult engineering problem.

The three communities are supplied by the Hackensack Water Company from the pumping plant at New Milford. This water is delivered through some twelve miles of pipe lines, and in the vicinity of Carlstadt enters what is known to engineers as a low-pressure area.

To restore the pressure at this point to the standard maintained by the company, the pipe lines have been conducted into a mammoth steel tank. This receptacle is nearly 335 feet in circumference, has a depth of 24 feet and is capable of holding 1,000,000 gallons.

Rising 100 feet above the main tank is another steel reservoir tower with a capacity of 250,000 gallons. While the large tank fills by pressure from the New Milford plant, two centrifugal pumps "boost" this incoming flow to the upper tower, from which it is piped into the mains supplying the surrounding district.

BRONX AUCTIONS.

Several Apartment Houses in Murphy's List This Week.

A variety of Bronx real estate, including several apartment houses, will be offered at auction this week by J. R. Murphy. Tomorrow he will sell eight two-family houses on St. Lawrence Avenue, between Randall and Seward Avenues, and a vacant plot, 125 by 110 feet irregular, on the west side of Appleton Avenue, near Roberts Avenue.

On Tuesday he will offer 1,776 Castle Hill Avenue, six-story apartment house, on a plot 175 by 116 feet irregular; and 2,130 Westchester Avenue, one-story building, on a plot 64 by 68 feet.

On Wednesday, 4,053 Park Avenue, two-story frame dwelling, on a lot 16.8 by 100.3 feet. Thursday, 404 Claremont Parkway, four-story apartment house, on a plot 54 by 75 feet; a frame dwelling and garage, on a lot 25 by 103 feet, on the north side of Quimby Avenue, west of Olmstead Avenue; and 2,970 Daniel Street, a two-story frame dwelling with garage, on a lot 25 by 100 feet.

Friday, 1,755-59 Weeks Avenue, five-story apartment house, on a plot 95 by 100 feet; 886 Cranford Avenue, stucco dwelling, on a lot of 25 by 100 feet; the brick taxpayer, on a plot 72 by 100 feet, at the southwest corner of Trinity Avenue and 156th Street; and a vacant plot on the north side of East 172d Street, near Morrison Avenue.

Leases 50th Shoe Store.

Thoens & Flaunlacher leased to Miles Shoes the large store formerly occupied by the F. W. Woolworth Company at 1,681-1,683 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn. This will be the fiftieth store for Miles Shoes.

MODEL HOME AT STEWART MANOR TO BE OPENED FOR INSPECTION TODAY

TODAY marks the official opening at the Stewart Manor (L. I.) home development of Realty Associates of the first 1930 Master Model Home sponsored by Home Owners Institute of America in the New York area.

Its plan, selected from among thousands of entries in the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition, its building materials and equipment of highest quality, its artistic and tasteful furnishing throughout—this house presents a truly educational exhibit of all that a home should be.

How to Reach Model Home.

Appropriate opening ceremonies are scheduled for 2 o'clock this afternoon. The public is invited to this event and also to visit the home at any time during the month in which it will remain open. Stewart Manor is reached by train from Pennsylvania Station via the Long Island Railroad. Motorists will drive through Hillside Avenue to Jericho Turnpike, thence to the New Hyde Park Road directly to the home development.

When the doors are thrown open this afternoon, visitors will observe a pleasing demonstration of interior decoration as well as construction details and permanent equipment. The furnishing and decorating departments of John Wanamaker's have furnished the home throughout.

"Other than its position as first Model Home to open in the 1930 Home Owners Institute program in the New York area, the Stewart Manor Master Model Home occupies another unique position," James Graham, vice president of Realty Associates, said in announcing the opening to the public. "For this house is the first example in the metropolitan area of one of the prize-winning designs of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural competition put before the public in finished and substantial form of brick and copper and slate. It marks the transition from the theoretical architectural presentation on paper to the sturdy, easily understood brick and mortar of the builder.

Utilize Prize Design.

"The purpose of this demonstration home is to carry out by the best construction methods known the outstanding architectural merits of the prize-winning design selected from among thousands during the recent competition," Mr. Graham continued. "Recognizing that a house design on paper is a distinctly different thing from a house of bricks, plaster and stone, L. Porter Moore, president of Home Owners Institute, has furthered the building of this and other demonstration houses throughout the country in order that the public might more surely visualize the beauties of quality home architecture.

"In order to carry out to the fullest the intentions of the architect of this house, Amedeo Leone of Detroit, when he created the design which brought to him the third grand prize of $1,500 in the national competition, only tried and true building materials.

Believing that this house demonstrates to all prospective home owners the principles upon which comfortable and happy living is founded, we welcome all visitors to it.

"Within its doors they will find a well-planned interior tastefully furnished in a manner which carries out the architectural charm of the exterior.

"The appearance of this demonstration home as it will be seen by visitors arriving today is that of a lived-in dwelling. Its surroundings have been carefully considered from the viewpoint of the landscape architect, and shrubs and small trees have been placed around it in the manner suggested by the architect in his original sketch of the house.

"Evergreens of considerable height flank the stone doorway with its formal broken pediment above which combines so well with the rich texture of brick walls.

"A brass knocker and brass lock and handle gleam from the rich wood of the door itself. Small plantings around the house include rhododendrons which will lend their color to the house ensemble when they bloom in the Spring. A hedge has been set in around the entire property lines and along all walks. This will shortly form a most effective border."

Final inspection of the home by the local committee of Home Owners' Institute was made following a luncheon given by Mr. Graham at the clubhouse on the property on Thursday. Together with members of the sales staff of the organization building the house, the committeemen went over the dwelling point by point emphasizing the special advantages of quality building materials as utilized in its construction.

Activity on Other Model Houses.

Activity at other master model homes in the New York area indicates progress which will bring them to completion in ample time for scheduled openings.

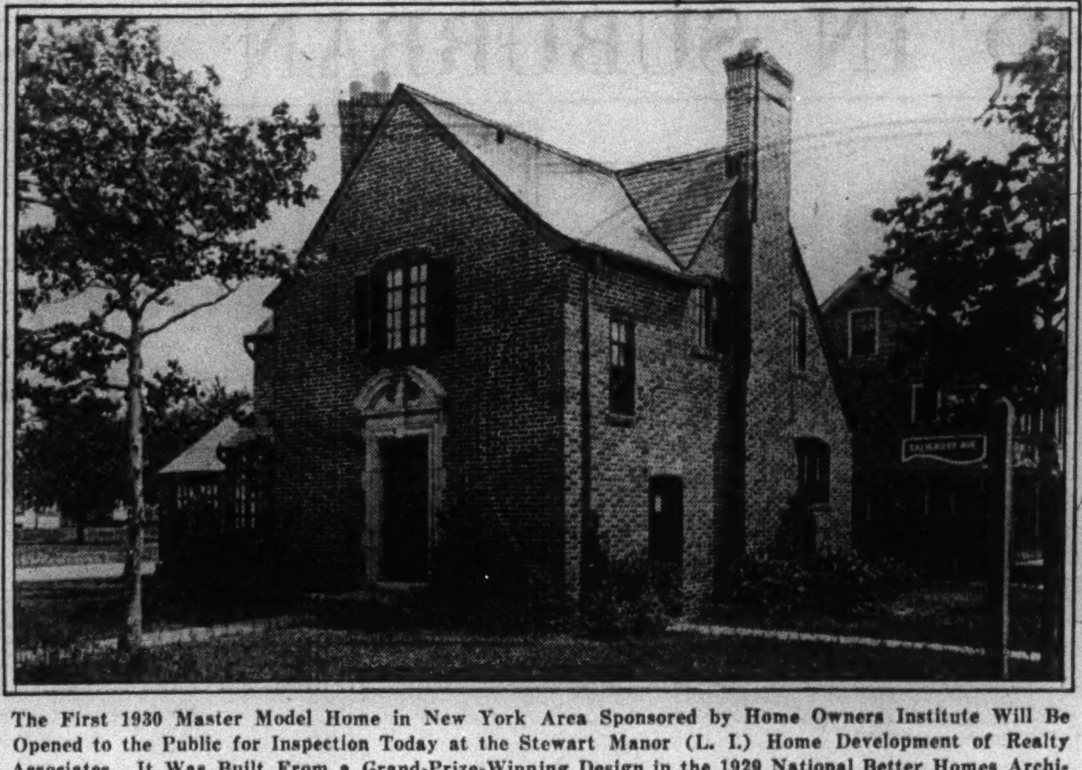
The second coat of plaster has been completed at the Orchard Hill master model home being built by Mutual Builders of Orchard Hill from the prize-winning design of Rhees E. Burket, architect, of Detroit. Walls now await the finish of a third coat. During the past week the concrete cellar floor has been poured preparatory to the full enjoyment of this part of the house by the home-owning family.

Oak timbers are a distinguishing feature on the exterior of the house, especially around the sunroom. These have been stained so that rain or dampness from the application of stucco on the outside walls will not harm them.

Activity is decidedly noticeable around the grounds of the house where grading is going on. In order that every convenience may be provided immediately upon the ultimate owner's taking possession, gas, water and electric lines are being brought to the house front.

Decision has been made to paint the entire exterior of the Roi L. Morin design being built at Nassau Shores (L. I.) by the Harmon Housing Corporation in white. Work has started on this painting which will tie the brick first floor and the wood siding upper floor into one color unit. Plumbing fixtures have been set in place.

Tilers are still at work in the Cheelcroft master model home built at Hohokus, N. J., by Harold W. Cheel, realtor-builder. Finish floors which are of oak throughout except in bathrooms are in process of being laid. Interior trim will shortly be completed.



The First 1930 Master Model Home in New York Area Sponsored by Home Owners Institute Will Be Opened to the Public for Inspection Today at the Stewart Manor (L. I.) Home Development of Realty Associates. It Was Built From a Grand-Prize-Winning Design in the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition Conducted by the Institute and Was Designed by Amedeo Leone, Architect, of Detroit.

RENOVATING TENEMENTS.

Lower East Side Owners Modernize Old Buildings.

Owners of many tenement houses on the lower east side are making extensive alterations to their buildings, according to the East Side Chamber of Commerce, which has just completed a survey of remodeling work in that territory.

About $410,000 was invested during the first seven months of this year for improved housing, the survey showed. Owners of nineteen old buildings are spending approximately $369,000 at present to modernize their buildings, and in so doing are able to command higher rentals.

Bernard Golden is reported as spending $100,000 on three houses in Catherine Street, two on Oak Street and two on Roosevelt Street. The Roosevelt and Oak Street buildings will have incinerators, and all will have electricity, steam heat, panel walls and tile baths. The Catherine Street houses, which are fifty years old, formerly rented for $25 an apartment, but now with the renovation have been leased at $70. Improvements are under way also on tenements in Stanton, Clinton, Rivington, Norfolk, Orchard, Monroe, Columbia and Willett Streets to provide 235 remodeled suites for Fall occupancy.

Winton Ownership Apartments.

One of the largest garden apartment houses in Westchester is being erected in the Bronxville section by the Winton Ownership Plan, Inc., which involves a dual ownership or rental plan enabling a tenant to own his apartment in less than a dozen years.

Included in the plan of the buildings in course of construction are the most desirable features of a private home blended with the best apartment features. Suites contain three and one half rooms to five rooms.

New East Side House.

The apartment building at 333 East Fifty-third Street, built by Edgar Ellinger under the new multiple-dwelling law, has been completed and about 75 per cent of the suites have been rented, according to Douglas L. Elliman & Co., agents. Apartments range in size from one to four rooms. The design under the new law allowed construction of a variety of terraces and penthouse suites.

Popularity of Miniature Golf Courses Provides Income for Small-Lot Owners

The popularity of miniature golf courses has proved a boon to many owners of vacant plots in the metropolitan area. Almost overnight hundreds of these small links have sprung up in strategic points near the main highways, in residential sections and close to beach resorts.

The small links have provided lot owners with a new means of meeting carrying charges and taxes on their property, heretofore usually realized through the erection of taxpayers or leases for gasoline filling stations or refreshment stands.

The courses can be constructed quickly and at small cost. The sites average about 100 by 100 feet, and standardized courses of eighteen holes may be constructed and equipped ready for playing in about ten days at an expenditure of from $1,750 to $3,500. In the outlying sections of the city suitable sites may be leased for comparatively small rates. Even in Manhattan several miniature courses are in operation, although the scarcity of vacant land and the value of property makes these more expensive. The added expense, however, may be offset by the larger patronage which may be attracted in congested areas.

Brooklyn and Queens have a large number of these small courses, although the Bronx, Westchester, New Jersey and other sections have a fair proportion. The resort areas are well supplied.

Small Links Increasing.

The rapidity with which the small links are spreading is evidenced by the recent statement of John J. Bracken, chief of the Brooklyn and Queens division of the License Department of New York City, that no less than 100 applications for licenses for small golf courses were received in the two boroughs within a two-weeks' period.

Mr. Bracken pointed out that the game had been instrumental in the cleaning up of many unused lots which had been eyesores. Most of the courses are open at night and on Sundays. They are subject to tax as amusements.

Some towns have voiced opposition to miniature links in residential zones, but usually they appear to have been welcomed as a means of improving the appearance of idle plots, and as a new means of income for the property owners.

The game has opened up new business for realty men, who have been kept busy supplying the demand for sites. Samuel Galitzka, a Brooklyn real estate broker, expressed the opinion that the game was likely to be of lasting popularity, rather than a fad, supplying in a convenient way the need for outdoor amusement and exercise. He announced that during the past few weeks he had closed a number of leases on sites for this purpose.

Miniature golf also has invaded the theatres. In East Orange, N. J., the auditorium of the Oxford Theatre has been converted into a course, with the stage remodeled for archery. A similar plan has been adopted by the Fox Theatres Corporation for the remodeling of the Kew Gardens Theatre, Queens Boulevard and Union Turnpike, and for the Audubon Theatre, 168th Street and Broadway.

Construction of these "demi-tasse" courses has provided employment for many persons in recent months and has created a new demand for lumber and other materials. The National Lumber bulletin visualizes future recreation centres growing out of the courses and urges the enclosure of the links to make them usable all through the year.

Another golfing fad which has resulted in the utilization of a number of vacant plots is the "driving range" where patrons may practice their swings and tee shots. Cost of constructing such ranges is negligible, but they require much larger space than the miniature golf links.

Sunshine City Offices.

The Charles H. Reis Company, developers of Sunshine City, N. J., will maintain offices in that place despite the fact that its operations have been transferred to Allwood, in Passaic County, where a new residential town is being built. E. L. Harrison has been appointed manager of the Sunshine City offices.

APARTMENT FINISHED.

New Madison Avenue House Nearly Ready for Tenants.

Completion is announced of the fifteen-story and penthouse apartment house at 47 East Eighty-eighth Street, corner of Madison Avenue. When decoration of the interior is finished, it will be opened to tenants more than a month ahead of schedule, according to Pease & Elliman, renting and managing agents. The building was constructed by A. H. McRae and Norman Woolworth.

The house is on the northeast corner of Madison Avenue on a site formerly occupied by five private dwellings. It was designed by George Fred Pelham in the Italian Renaissance type.

All of the suites have living rooms facing on the street and furnished with a wood-burning fireplace. Typical apartments consist of seven rooms with three baths, some with terraces. There are also suites of five to nine rooms.

SALES AT GLEN ROCK.

Several New Yorkers Buy Homes in Jersey Community.

In the Glen Rock home community adjoining Ridgewood, N. J., on the Erie Railroad, several residential deals have recently been closed by the Smith-Singer brokerage firm.

A contract has just been awarded for a dwelling on Concord Avenue for Charles La Rue of Jersey City, Ernest Stateler of the McGraw-Hill Publishing Company bought a stucco dwelling on Roxbury Place, L. S. Mills of the Union Carbide Company purchased a stucco dwelling on Ashton Place, Robert V. Lee of the Chemical Bank and Trust Company leased a home at 642 Spring Avenue and Charles P. MacIver leased a home at 15 Sterling Place. A tract of land on Bank Street was leased to Peyton Pearson of Passaic for a miniature golf course, being the fourth in Glen Rock.

Tenements at Auction.

Thomas F. Burchill will sell next week, Tuesday, Aug. 26, the two tenement houses at 318 East 112th Street and 320 East 126th Street, and on Aug. 27 he will sell the tenement at 323 East Fifty-eighth Street, all being held in the Vesey Street sales room.

BUILDING IS ACTIVE ON MADISON AVENUE

Retail Zone Ruling Aids Activity in Midtown Section, Says W. J. Pedrick.

TROLLEY REMOVAL URGED

Proposal Is Favored to Extend Thoroughfare Southward From Madison Square.

Considerable realty and building activity is noted along Madison Avenue, and civic improvements under way or proposed for that area should stimulate its growth, in the opinion of Captain W. J. Pedrick, executive vice president of the Fifth Avenue Association.

The rapidity with which this future development takes place depends in a large measure on the speed with which the city acts in the removal of street cars above Forty-second Street and the substitution of a bus system all along the avenue, according to Captain Pedrick.

"Fifth, Park and Madison Avenues have been developed almost as a unit during the past twenty years," he said. "While major improvements have kept Park Avenue in the limelight during the past few years, and while Fifth Avenue is constantly in the foreground in realty development, and in giving to the city the highlights of business, Madison Avenue has received every improvement, every piece of safeguarding legislation, and every civic benefit that has contributed to the growth of either of its sister avenues.

"To this interest is responsible the the development represented in the construction of such buildings as the New York Life Insurance Building, the Lefcourt Building, the Columbia Building, the International Combustion Building at 200 Madison Avenue, and others during the past few years. Buildings are planned for Thirty-first Street and Madison Avenue, where a church and office building will occupy the southeast corner; for Fortieth Street and Madison Avenue, where a forty-story office building will be erected, and for Thirty-ninth Street and Madison Avenue, where plans are under consideration for a large office building. Between Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Streets on the west side of Madison Avenue, the entire block is open to business development following the recent decision of the Court of Appeals in upholding the validity of the retail zone law as it applies to that section. The Murray Hill and Paine covenants, which had long constituted a barrier to the logical development of this block, were also overruled by the courts in granting permission to the owner of this property to proceed with his development plans.

New Office Buildings Planned.

"Further north on Madison Avenue there is evidence of even greater building interest. The addition to the New Weston Hotel at Fiftieth Street is completed; on the west side of the avenue between Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Streets, demolition of existing buildings is under way for a forty-story office building involving the entire block frontage on Madison Avenue; at Fifty-third and Madison plans have been filed for still another forty-story office building, and between Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth another building is being planned, while north of Sixtieth Street residential building is keeping pace with the similar development on Fifth Avenue facing the park. The twenty-one-story office building erected last year at Thirty-second Street and Madison Avenue is still another which has found Madison Avenue a profitable location.

"That this building program on Madison Avenue produces buildings of a high type is evidenced by the fact that several of the awards made by the Fifth Avenue Association during the past few years have gone to Madison Avenue structures.

"An alteration which is noteworthy at this time is the change which has been made in the 185 Madison Avenue building at Thirty-fourth Street. This building, opposite B. Altman & Co., now houses the Hanover National Bank.

"A turning point in the realty development of Madison Avenue was the campaign started several years ago by the Fifth Avenue Association and real estate interests to have the Madison Avenue street cars removed. Prior to that time, the avenue had been widened from Twenty-fourth Street north, its roadways had been repaired with the same care as that given to Fifth Avenue, additional lighting facilities had been added, and a traffic signal light control system had been installed for the entire length of the avenue, even though the benefits of the system are nullified to some extent by the presence of the street cars north of Forty-second Street, which makes it difficult for the automobiles to follow the light signals. The removal of the Forty-second Street subway kiosk and the widening of Forty-second Street at this point, accomplished last year after some six years of negotiations, has relieved traffic congestion at that corner by 20 per cent.

Two Plans for Trolley Removal.

"That these street cars must go eventually is assured. They have long constituted a barrier to development, and this street in the heart of the midtown should not be encumbered by a transportation system which effectually prevents it from carrying its proper share of traffic. Park and Fifth Avenues are already bearing their share of the north and south traffic of Manhattan. The owners of the street car line, the New York & Harlem Railroad, have indicated their willingness to consider a plan for the removal of the line. Two plans advanced were under consideration last year. The first was for the city to purchase the line outright and, after settling its bus policy, determine upon the operation of a substitute transportation line along the route now traveled by the street cars; the second plan was a tentative offer on the part of the owner-company to exchange franchises with the city.

"The present street car franchise has almost 460 years to run, and this the street car company would exchange for a twenty-five year bus franchise with an option for renewing this franchise for a similar period. The bus line so granted would operate the length of Madison Avenue, instead of turning off as it does now at Forty-second Street. The development that such a line running down Madison Avenue to the Square would bring to Madison Avenue south of Forty-second Street holds pleasant prospects for owners of property in that section. The line, of course, would be continued down the Bowery and over the same route now traveled by the street cars. Unfortunately, no action was taken on either of these plans in 1929.

"We have on record the petitions of the majority of the property owners and business men and women on Madison Avenue from Twenty-third Street north. The removal of the car line and the repaving of the street and substitution of buses will add greatly to midtown traffic facilities, opening up a new longitudinal thoroughfare all the way from Manhattan Bridge to the northern part of the borough. The street cars would be removed from Madison Avenue north to 138th Street, from Forty-second Street, from the Park Avenue tunnel between Thirty-fourth and Forty-second Streets on Park Avenue, from Fourth Avenue, from the Bowery south to Broome Street, and along Grand Street, Centre Street and Park Row.

"Under a law passed in June of this year the sign restrictions which formerly applied only to Madison Avenue between Thirty-fourth and Seventy-second Streets now extend from Twenty-third to Ninety-sixth Street, adding thirty-five blocks on this street to the restricted area.

"What might prove to be an interesting improvement to Madison Avenue is the plan which has recently been approved by Day & Zimmermann, engineers employed by Mayor Walker to study traffic relief in the city, to extend Madison Avenue south of Madison Square. It is certain that such a plan would bring added relief to traffic, and if the proposal which has been made that residential Fifth Avenue may go northward from Washington Square to Twenty-third Street holds merit, the extension of Madison Avenue south might bring about the deevlopment of that new section as a high-class residential area."

NEW GARDEN SUITES.

Two Six-Story Apartments Completed at Jackson Heights.

Two new garden apartment houses at Jackson Heights have just been opened for inspection. They will be ready for occupancy early in the Fall.

The buildings are Maple Court, on a plot 200 by 100 feet, on the east side of Eighty-first Street between Fillmore and Polk Avenues and Beech Court, occupying the block front of 200 feet on the north side of Fillmore Avenue, between Seventy-fifth and Seventy-sixth Streets, with a depth of 115 feet.

Maple Court was designed by Ricca & Ungarlieder, architects, and is being built by the Polkmore Building Corporation. It has sixty-four suites of three and four rooms.

Beech Court, designed by the same architects, also is a six-story building with sixty-four apartments of two, three, four and five rooms, and is being built by the Rayzel Holding Corporation.

And we'll wager she's never heard of Tudor City

And there are a lot of other things this young lady doesn't know. For example, that Tudor City is the one place in New York today where you can really live. It is four minutes—walking—from Grand Central, in green parks swept by fresh cool breezes. Offering these services: maid, laundry and valet; drug store, community store; two restaurants; children's playgrounds; theatre ticket agency; circulating library; golf school and a miniature 18-hole golf course. There is no place like Tudor City. And the following apartments for rent:

2 ROOMS AND BATH

An unusual apartment on the 11th floor. Living room, 12' 6" x 15' 6", is irregular and has a window seat. Bedroom 10' 9" x 15' 6". Ample closets, serving pantry and foyer. Hatfield House.

4 ROOMS AND BATH

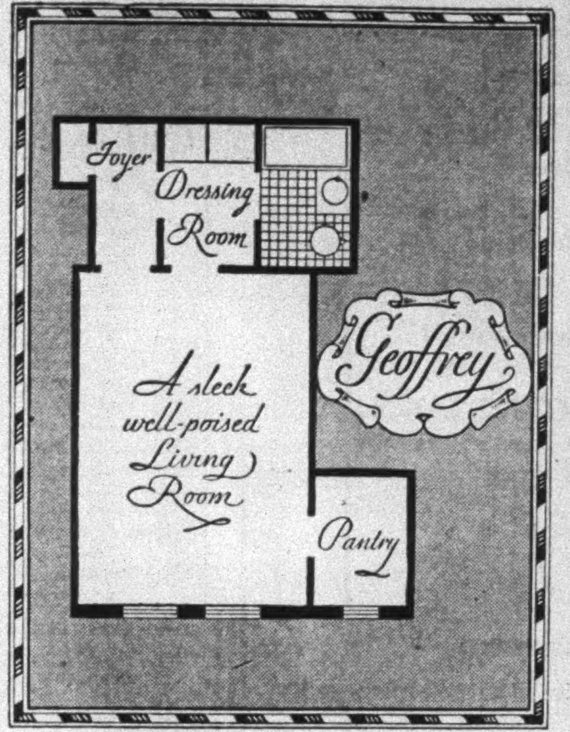
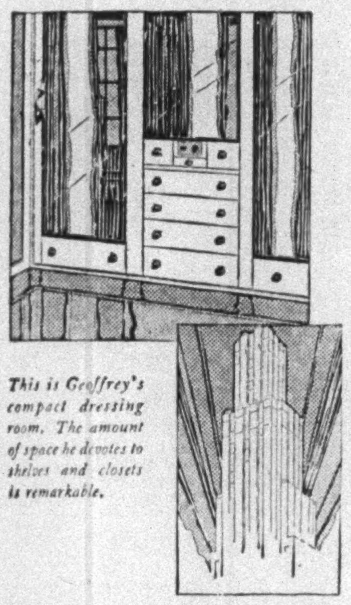
HERE IS AN APARTMENT WITH A PERSONALITY -we've named it GEOFFREY



WHY name an apartment? Because these at The Town House are all as different and as individual as people.

Take GEOFFREY for example. He's a very self-contained, sophisticated one room apartment . . . From the moment you enter his foyer and hang your coat in his big closet, you will want to know him better. He is masculine and modern. He likes everything right at hand. His dressing room is a neat affair, with a dressing stand for precise tie adjusting, closets and shelves for a vast wardrobe. He is hospitable—will serve you dinner from his perfectly equipped pantry. It has a gas stove, silent gas refrigerator and all that. Or he will make you comfortable for the night by rolling out a wide bed.

Always the perfect host, he probably won't point out all these: the adjustable shaving lights and shower mixer in the bath; polished cork floors; chromium fixtures; khrome marble baseboards; efficient ventilation in the bath and pantry. The gas for the refrigerator and the maid service are included in GEOFFREY'S rent. If you're living spiritually as well as physically in 1930 you'll want to meet GEOFFREY. You'll find him at The Town House, and we'll introduce you.



This is Geoffrey's compact dressing room. The amount of space he devotes to shelves and closets is remarkable.

Washington Square

SITUATED at the very threshold of the city's famous Fifth Avenue, and delightfully free from traffic and transportation problems, Washington Square today embodies all the attributes of the glorious Washington Square of yesterday—luxurious, dignified homes, with the tradition of innate refinement of Old New York.

The Time to Rent Is NOW!

The right time to rent is right now . . . while there is still a good selection. Many apartments are available for immediate possession, too, with leases dated from October 1st. The place to rent is the West Side, New York's best side. Best because of the fresher, cleaner air blown across the Hudson and Central Park; because of the better transit facilities; because you can take advantage of the efficient management of Wood, Dolson, who have specialized on the West Side for over 30 years.

MANSFIELD THEATRE
MARC CO

Whichever sort you like. The Theatre lies a few blocks South. Central Park lies four blocks North. And you will enjoy the short walk between 101 West 55th Street and the most important places in New York. The Fifth Avenue shopping district lies one block East. The Grand Central Zone is only a brisk ten minute walk. Of course, if you want to get downtown or anywhere else, there are an elevated and subway right at hand. Most of the apartments have: fireplaces, service vestibules, shower mixers, electric refrigerators, and dish washing machines. You will find the staff here most courteous and efficient.

Broadway Bustles By!

Broadway bustles by, but at THE APTHORP you might be a million miles away. Here, escape from the turmoil of the city is provided by an enclosed court, where green things grow and fountains play. You enjoy a restful atmosphere, which makes life comfortable and peaceful.

THE APTHORP covers a square block and is built about a large garden court, which most of the bedrooms face. Here every apartment is a livable home . . . large, airy, comfortable.

Modern throughout—THE APTHORP is, nevertheless, arranged, managed and serviced in a way which is pleasantly reminiscent of the more gracious living of a less hurried age.

Rentals at THE APTHORP are reasonable—from $3000 to $7500

ADVANTAGES OF LIVING AT THE ROOSEVELT

1. It is located on the finest boulevard in the Bronx...in a healthful, desirable neighborhood.
2. Because of a tremendous inner court and full block coverage, every room is an outside room, with a maximum of light and air.
3. The court comprises a beautiful, landscaped garden.
4. The rooms, unusually large, are designed for cross ventilation.
5. A new subway station will be at the building itself. Bus transportation passes the door.
6. The school, one block away is reached without crossing traffic. Garages and marketing facilities are conveniently near.
7. A uniformed guard is on duty for the protection of the children.
8. Every modern convenience has been installed to add to your ease and comfort.
9. Tenants are of a high type.
10. Rentals are surprisingly moderate.

Live and Play in the Tarrytowns

NEW YORK'S population is moving northward—into Westchester—particularly along the scenic Hudson River where John D. Rockefeller, Jr., erected the magnificent

Van Tassel Apartments

Surrounding nearly two acres of superbly landscaped gardens into which has been built every modern convenience.

The Advantages Offered Are

1—The Van Tassel Apartments are built like an old time castle offering 100 per cent fireproof protection.

2—Views of natural beauty—the distant Palisades, Pocantico Hills, and an inside garden 450 by 180 feet unequalled for its rustic beauty.

3—Located on the main line of the New York Central—42 minutes from Grand Central. Seats for every passenger. No strap hanging. Express commutation less than $10 monthly.

4—Outlets for radio aerials in each room—electric refrigeration—auditorium to entertain your friends.

5—Fully equipped playground for the children with a trained instructor. Up-to-date garage. Uniformed staff trained to serve. Our own uniformed police department.

6—Van Tassel Apartment courtesy bus meets all trains.

7—Located near the Kingsland Point Park maintained by the Westchester County Park Commission—numerous golf, tennis and swimming clubs.

8—For those who care to ride, there are more miles of bridle path in the Tarrytowns than anywhere else in Westchester.

9—All roads from Tarrytown radiate out into Westchester's $100,000,000 park system.

10—New York City water is served exclusively to tenants of the Van Tassel Apartments.

WE INVITE YOUR INSPECTION of our building and particularly call your attention to the MODEL FURNISHED APARTMENT.

An Island Paradise . . . Now ready for the LOT Buyer & Home Builder!

SUNSET ISLAND, N. J., in BARNEGAT BAY between TOMS RIVER and SEASIDE HEIGHTS, N. J.

Automobilists en route to Lakewood, Atlantic City and other New Jersey coast resorts have for the past few months cast longing eyes on this accessible and charming waterfront development. They tried to buy homesites, but the owners refused to sell a single lot until they completed a gigantic improvement program of installing BULKHEADS, SIDEWALKS, CURBS, GRAVEL ROADS, ELECTRICITY and WATER.

These improvements have been installed and are paid for, and the public may now reap the healthful benefits to be enjoyed by residents on Sunset Island.

It is the ideal Summer playground, where water sports in Barnegat Bay and the Atlantic Ocean are at their very best—Boating, Bathing, Fishing and Crabbing. A substantial bulkhead encircles Sunset Island, providing waterfront lot buyers with excellent docking facilities.

Sunset Island immediately adjoins Seaside Heights, where all shopping facilities are available, as well as churches, schools and railroad station. State Highway (Route 37), a main auto thoroughfare, bisects Sunset Island and leads from the ocean to Toms River, also a shopping and amusement centre; Philadelphia, Trenton and other large cities.

BILL CUMMINGS—(the name is fictitious, but the story is true)—is an executive in a well known corporation. He and his wife wanted to buy a home—but the one they had selected cost $15,000.

Curiosity brought them to Stafford Lawns. Never before had they seen such a distinctive community—a veritable little English suburb, replete with every new-day improvement—streets paved from curb to curb, sidewalks, shrubbery and within a convenient distance to tennis, golfing, beaches and shopping centre.

They became interested in these charming English Homes, individual in design and construction on a beautifully landscaped plot.

They examined everything most critically—the spacious living room with its cheery open fireplace,—a charming dining room with paneled wood walls,—the kitchen with its Electrolux silent refrigerator, Custom-built kitchen units, colored tile double drain boards and linoleum flooring—the cheerfully furnished breakfast room—the conveniently located extra lavatory on first floor—the colored tile bathroom with colored plumbing fixtures and fully tiled standing shower—a spacious master bedroom with 2 closets, two other good sized bedrooms—seven roomy closets, one cedar lined,—a laundry in the basement—chestnut trim and oak stairs—brass water pipes—seven-eighths inch oak flooring—a Spencer Automatic Feeding steam plant which burns Buckwheat, the most economical coal—slate mansard roof and numerous other quality features that they had wanted.

And then he changed his mind—for here was the $15,000 home he wanted at a price he could afford.

$92.34 per month pays all carrying charges and reduces the second mortgage an average of $41.67 per month.

$43 a month is the total carrying charge on your home when the second mortgage is paid off at the end of 5 years.

Now You Can Be Sure!

If your mind is turning from city apartments to tree-clad hills, green valleys and waterways—where you can own your own suburban home, here's a timely thought: Select a new home in Mountain Lakes—and rent it for a try-out period. You have the option of purchasing under our Rental-Purchase-Option Plan. Send for details.

Mountain Lakes (on the Lackawanna) has been established under unified control as a restricted residential colony for over 15 years. It is no "new development." It is no summer cottage resort. It has over 2,000 residents and 80% of its family heads are New York business men who commute the year 'round. An active building program is under way this year, with modern homes on 100-foot frontages at prices from $12,500 up.

Beautiful Small Estate

Bordering a Famous Golf Course

The residence, of true Norman architecture, overlooks the green fairway, shaded dells and cool blue lakes of one of Westchester's oldest Golf Clubs. Here you will find the romantic beauty of the Old World, combined with the finest in modern convenience and construction.

Heavy oak doors, leaded glass windows in steel casement sash, old wrought iron hardware, grilled iron stairway, Belgian tile baths, and a great vaulted living room with lovely balcony bring to this delightful home an atmosphere of medieval beauty.

In addition to the beautiful entrance hall and living room, the house contains a large billiard room, dining room, breakfast room, pantry, kitchen equipped with electric dishwasher, laundry; six bedrooms, four baths; two servants' rooms and bath—all reflecting an atmosphere of luxury and refinement. The grounds are beautifully landscaped with evergreens and shrubbery.

The price at which this property is offered for sale barely covers the cost of the residence alone.

JACOB PENN, INC.,
15 PARK PLACE.
Established in 1919.

IF ANY ORGANIZATION
or individual in the business of assisting men of account to make connections merits the word "expert," the thousands that have known us for 12 years will tell you that we do. The first and only person who ever lectured for the N. Y. City Board of Education on the subject of ways and means of establishing new connections is the head of this corporation. The first and only person to conduct a Department devoted to a discussion of methods of marketing personal services and principals of making good in one's position was conducted weekly by the founder of our individual, confidential advertising Service in the oldest large-circulation weekly in America. The first and only person to conduct a similar Department in representative daily newspapers thruout America, involving 10,000,000 and more daily readers, was conducted by the man who has led this company for 12 years and thousands to GOOD AND BETTER PLACES. You have the services of this man when you engage us to assist you in finding your opportunity. We can solve your problem. Confer with us!

WE ARE HOLDING
for Sept. 7 announcement we consider greatest we made in our 12 years of operation. Great good it will do all men working for a living and in business to read it.

HIGH-SALARIED EXECUTIVES.

We market your services confidentially and shape our plans to meet your individual problems. Our established contacts with company officials have been developed over a period of 21 years.

The NATIONAL	was founded by
E. H. Gary	R. W. De Forest
L. F. Hine	George F. Baker
O. H. Kahn	Otto T. Bannard
L. F. Loree	J. D. Rockefeller
and 20 other	prominent men.

SALESMEN AND SALEMANAGERS.

This advertisement is a message of outstanding importance to every man who needs quick cash—Read it—every word.

Our campaign for memberships in our Beach Club is one of the most successful ever staged in New York. We actually paid out to a very few men about $65,000 in commissions in about four months of active selling. We have the right deal at the right time. Our Beach Club at Long Beach is one of the finest propositions of its kind ever offered to New Yorkers—every one says it is a "knockout." This club is now completed, fully equipped and in full operation. We now have hundreds of applications for membership. They must be followed up. We need you to do it.

We will pay you more probably than you can earn on any other commission job.

We are starting our new campaign tomorrow at 10 o'clock sharp. We want thirty men—men regardless of experience—men who need to make money—men who will work our way. These men without doubt should make a lot of quick money from the first day.

Don't fail—
Get started tomorrow—
We want you—
Ten o'clock sharp.

OVER $10,000,000 OF SUPER-CORPORATIONS OF AMERICA TRUST SHARES SOLD BECAUSE:

1—Many people do not have cash for investments or are not in a "buying mood" today. But they do have plenty of securities—good, fair and poor. So they are selling out their inferior holdings and switching the proceeds into the 30 outstanding issues in our portfolio, such as

American Telephone and Telegraph
United States Steel
General Electric
Standard Oil of New Jersey.

2—1930 Banner Year for Fixed Trusts. "It's an ill wind that doesn't blow somebody some good." The stock market crash of last Fall and the business depression that followed has hurt most fields of business and finance, but it has pushed the fixed trust movement to the fore by leaps and bounds. Already it has attracted many leading investment banking houses and the surface hasn't been scratched.

3—1930 Investment Salesmen's Big Year to Build a Fine Clientele. Worried investors are more receptive to sound investment counsel today than at any time since 1921. Busy executives, attorneys and professional men are looking for competent investment counsel, so they can devote their time to their own work.

4—LEADS—AND PLENTY OF THEM.

This is not a "get-rich-quick" job. But for a man of good appearance and education, who is looking for a genuine opportunity to establish himself in a permanent, dignified profession, with a small organization that will recognize merit, this opportunity of unlimited earnings on a commission basis should appeal.

Apply in person 11 A. M. or 3 P. M. Monday.

We will discuss the matter in detail. Then if it appeals to you, we will arrange for a private interview with our President, to discuss your qualifications, references, &c. A thorough course of training given if you are accepted.

Sales Help Wanted—Male.

SALESMEN.

We wish to meet and talk with a few men of strong personality who know they are salesmen of aptitude for sales work. These men will base their self-confidence on their knowledge of what real selling is. They have sold something of a collateral nature. They have obtained some success. The men who will interest us need not necessarily understand every ramification of finance but will have a flair for financial propositions.

Some of these men may have looked over openings in the financial field and may have arrived at the conclusion that sales success in this field depends upon capitalizing social standing or connections or going through a long, low-paid period of building clientele or risking reputation on unsound undertakings. It is the real salesman who has arrived at this conservative questioning point of view that we are seeking—the man who is sure of himself and who rates his abilities and his reputation very highly. He is keen and ambitious, young enough, regardless of years, to be enthusiastic, and energetic, and who, above all, is a man of decision and character. For the men we select there is a ground floor opportunity. They will receive a valuable sales training and full cooperation from men of broad experience and unusual success in developing men into high wage earners, and who can help them earn substantial commissions from the very start.

Some calls will be made upon qualified leads. The offering is one of character, security of principal, ability to pay semi-annual dividends, and, based upon past reutrns, should be most profitable to the investor.

If you feel that your qualifications justify us considering you, telephone Caledonia 1538, Extension 37, for an appointment, or, better still, call in person if you like, 11th floor, 385 5th Av., and a courteous interview will be afforded you. If you are the man we want, you will know what to say to sell yourself. All conferences and communications will be held in complete confidence by the executive officers of this company.

SALESMEN.

LARGE COMPANY can use at this time several additional men of good appearance and willingness to learn in its permanent sales department to present our "SELF-COMPLETING" investment plan.

MEN SELECTED will be rapidly and properly trained and will have their future assured in a fast-growing business; unusual opportunity to advance to executive positions if ability is demonstrated.

OUR PROPOSITION is BROADCAST DAILY over RADIO STATION WOR and is being favorably received by the public due to its unusual and safety features; this work is dignified, earnings are far above the average commissions, and under our unusual plan of remuneration a steady income is assured.

WHITE PLAINS.
A LITTLE ESTATE.

It's hard to find a small, modern home out in the country at a low price. May we show you this one? It is 2 miles out on a wooded hill, overlooking a wide sweep of Westchester's beautiful countryside. These are some of the features: open fireplaces, hot water heat, 2-car garage, tiled kitchen, tiled bath, a small greenhouse and 146 feet of road frontage. All offered for $15,250, a price well below actual cost in order to ensure a quick sale.
